In line 3, after the word "paupers," insert the words "appointed under resolution of the House passed July 12, 1888;" and in line 8, after the word "of," insert the word "five" to fill the blank.

And as amended the committee recommend its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report.
Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I notice in the reading of the report that the Committee on Accounts has undertaken to change the rules of the House by giving to this select committee the right to report at any time. I make the point of order that the committee can not do so, and that that matter must be referred to the Committee on Rules, the Committee on Accounts having no jurisdiction of the subject.
The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. The only matter referred to the Committee on Accounts, and the only matter over which the committee has jurisdiction, under the rules of the House, is the appropriation out of the contingent fund of the House.
Mr. BURROWS. To that I have no objection, but to the other I have.
The SPEAKER. The Chair begs the indulgence of the gentleman for a moment to examine the resolution. [After a pause.] The Chair finds these words to which the gentleman objects were embodied in the original resolution, a fact which the Chair had overlooked in answering the gentleman's first suggestion, and supposes also that they were overlooked by the House in referring the resolution.
Mr. BURROWS. Undoubtedly it was an oversight. The question is whether they now have jurisdiction of the matter having been referred in that manner.
The SPEAKER. Having been referred to the committee the Chair supposes they have jurisdiction. However, that can be striken out on the point of order.
Mr. BURROWS. How is it reported at this time as a matter of privilege?
The SPEAKER. Simply because it is an appropriation to pay out of the contingent fund of the House. If, however, the point of order is made that it contains matters not privileged, the Chair would have to hold that the report in that form does not present a question of privilege. If that point of order is made, therefore, the Chair would have to sustain it, because the Chair has frequently decided that reports which contain matters not privileged lose whatever privilege they may otherwise have had.
Mr. BURROWS. I make that point of order.
Mr. SHAW. Can the change not be made by striking out these words?
The SPEAKER. That may be done by consent.
Mr. BURROWS. If that portion of the resolution is stricken out, I shall not object.
The SPEAKER. Without objection, then, those words will be stricken out.
Mr. HOLMAN. What part of the resolution?
The SPEAKER. That portion of the resolution allowing the committee to report at any time.
There being no objection, the following words were stricken from the resolution:

And said committee may report at any time.

Mr. SHAW. I now ask the adoption of the resolution as amended.
The resolution was adopted.
Mr. SHAW moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF FUNERAL EXPENSES.

Mr. BLANCHARD submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House, to the widow of James K. Edwards, deceased (late one of the Official Reporters of the House), the expenses of his last illness and funeral, not to exceed the sum of $500.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope that motion will not be entertained. To-night has been set apart for the consideration of matters reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.
Mr. MCMILLIN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois to try to get an arrangement for a day session now, in lieu of this evening. It would seem from the present condition of the business of the House that the matters to which he refers might be considered during the day instead of at night. The House is wearied out by the long strain upon it, the officers of the House, and especially the reporters, are tired out, and I hope the gentleman will consent to such an arrangement.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have consulted the members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and we are unanimously of the opinion that it would not be wise to adopt that course. The various conference reports will be coming in on appropriation and other bills and other matters which will take up every day.
Mr. MCMILLIN. I am satisfied the gentleman can get time for the consideration of his bills.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think not.
Mr. BLAND. I insist on the motion.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman will either withdraw the motion, or that the House will vote it down.
The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND, there were, on a division—ayes 87, noes 72.
Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. BURROWS. It is now 4 o'clock, and it will take over half an hour to call the roll; I therefore ask unanimous consent to vacate the order for the yeas and nays and that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock. [Cries of "That is right."]
Mr. BLAND. Regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question on the motion to adjourn, and the Clerk will call the roll.
The question was taken, and it was decided in the negative—yeas 24, nays 184, not voting 116; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call,

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, of New York, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. BARRY with Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, for the balance of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent to offer a bill for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by the withdrawal of the motion to take a recess.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion for a recess.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. McMILLIN's motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., was called to order by Mr. McCREARY, Speaker pro tempore, who directed the Clerk to read the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 19, 1888.

SIR: Hon. JAMES B. McCREARY is designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Thursday of next week the House take a recess at 5 p. m. until 8 p. m., the evening session being set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moves that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

GENERAL WILLIAM F. SMITH.

The first business in order was the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William F. Smith, late major-general United States Volunteers, to the position of major-general in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said William F. Smith, but this proviso shall be no bar to any claims for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of said William F. Smith may have after his decease.

The report (by Mr. TOWNSHEND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith, have carefully examined the same and submit the following report:

William F. Smith graduated at West Point in July, 1841, and was assigned to duty in the Corps of Topographical Engineers, with which he served continuously till it was consolidated with the Corps of Engineers, when he resigned his commission of major, in 1867. His service included duty on the survey of the Northern Lakes, at West Point as assistant professor of mathematics, in Texas on explorations, as engineer of the eleventh light-house district, and as engineer secretary of the Light-House Board.

At the outbreak of the rebellion he served as mustering officer in New York, on the staff of General Butler at Fort Monroe, and on that of General McDowell. He was appointed colonel of the Third Vermont Volunteers in July, 1861, and took part in the battle of Bull Run and the defense of Washington.

He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers in August, 1861, and as such commanded a division of McClellan's army from March to August, 1862, being engaged in the siege of Yorktown, the skirmish of Lee's Mills, the battles of Williamsburgh, Fair Oaks, White Oak Swamps, Savage Station, Glendale, and Malvern Hill.

He was breveted lieutenant-colonel United States Army, June 28, 1862 for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of White Oak Swamp, Virginia.

He was appointed major-general of volunteers July 4, 1862, and as such commanded a division in the Antietam campaign, taking part in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, and was breveted colonel for gallantry and meritorious services in the last-mentioned battle. He commanded the Sixth Corps in the Rappahannock campaign and the Ninth Corps in the Fredericksburgh campaign. He commanded a division in the Department of the Susquehanna, taking an active part in the pursuit of Lee's army on its retreat from Gettysburgh.

In October, 1863, he was transferred to the West, where he in turn became chief engineer of the Department of the Cumberland, on the staff of General George H. Thomas, and of the military division of the Mississippi, on the staff of General Grant. As such he devised the plan of operations by which the Army of the Cumberland was saved from starvation and capture at Chattanooga, and was duly credited with the same by General Thomas. He also devised the plan of operations by which Bragg's army was overthrown and driven back from Missionary Ridge, for which services he was again appointed and (this time) confirmed as major-general of volunteers, also as brevet brigadier-general United States Army.

When General Grant was appointed Lieutenant-General and assigned to the command of all the loyal armies, he took General Smith East with him and assigned him to the command of the Eighteenth Army Corps, with which he took part in the battles of Cold Harbor and the siege of Petersburgh.

He was assigned to special duty under the Secretery of War in November, 1864, and continued thereon till December, 1865, and finally resigned from the Army in 1867, after twenty-two years' continuous service. At that time he held the rank of major of engineers and brevet major-general United States Army.

In civil life he was president of the International Ocean Telegraph Company, president of the board of police commissioners New York, and now holds the position of Government agent in charge of a district of internal improvements in Delaware and Maryland, of which (the former) State he is a citizen.

General Smith is now past the age of retirement, and is fully entitled to that favor at the hands of the Government, for a lifetime of hard and conspicuous service in which he has always displayed the most incorruptible honesty, the most outspoken patriotism and devotion, and the highest ability.

It has been the good fortune of but few men in any age or in any country to save an army and direct it to victory from a subordinate position. Such a service in Europe would secure honor and riches: in ours it should certainly result in assignment to a place on the retired-list of the Army with the rank of major-general and the appropriate pay for the remaining years of his life.

The committee therefore unanimously recommend the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the bill be read again.

The bill was read again.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, as I did not catch it in the reading of the report, on account of the confusion around here, what his rank is now.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He is out of the service.

Mr. McMILLIN. How did he get out?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He resigned in 1867.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then he has been out of the service twenty years all but one?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that no man served his country more effectively during the late war than did General "Baldy" Smith. He entered the Army in 1841 as a West Point graduate, and continued in the service until 1867. Prior to the war he was a teacher at West Point, and rendered distinguished service in the Engineer Corps. At the beginning of the war he entered the Army as a colonel, and during the war he was brigade commander, he was division commander, he was corps commander, and he commanded the army of the James. It was believed by General Thomas, and it has been stated by others, that General Smith planned the campaign which saved the army at Chattanooga. He is now an old man, beyond the age for retirement; he is poor and is in need of the assistance of his Government, and it does seem to me that an officer who has rendered his country such great service, who was in at the beginning of the war and served from the beginning to the end, is certainly entitled in his old age to be placed on the retired-list and to receive the small pay that will thus come to him to save himself and his family from want.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. What will be his pay?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He will be retired as a major-general.

Mr. SENEY. Where is he employed now?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He is employed by the Government on engineer work.

Mr. SENEY. At what compensation?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not know, but the compensation is very small.

Mr. MATSON. Can the gentleman tell us whether General Smith is now drawing a pension?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He is not. He is now in the civil employment of the Government in connection with engineering work.

Mr. MATSON. Does the gentleman say that he has no information as to the amount of pay that General Smith would receive under this bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I believe it is two-thirds of the regular pay.

Mr. McMILLIN. No, it is three-fourths. But what is the regular pay?

Mr. SPINOLA. It amounts to between $5,000 and $6,000 a year.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And the amount that he would receive under this bill would be only three-fourths of that.

Mr. McMILLIN. Would he not receive about that amount under this bill?

Mr. SPINOLA. No. That is about the pay of a major-general.

Mr. MATSON. What was his rank in the regular Army?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He was appointed a brigadier-general and breveted major-general of volunteers during the war.

Mr. MATSON. But in the regular Army, I believe, he was never more than a colonel.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He was a colonel in the regular Army, but for gallant services on the battle-field he was promoted as I have stated. It would take too much time to enumerate all the battle-fields on which General Smith commanded. He was with McClellan when he first moved from Richmond, and he was with Meade at Gettysburgh.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "major-general" where it occurs and inserting "colonel."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman will not do that. The distinguished services of General Smith certainly entitle him to be retired with the rank of major-general, the rank which he held when he resigned. I do not believe there is another instance in the history of this country where a particular man saved an army as General Smith did at Chattanooga. If he had been serving a foreign country he would have been rewarded far beyond our power to reward him here. He would have been promoted to the highest rank, and would probably have had nobility conferred upon him.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is the difference between a republic and a despotism.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Another difference is that republics are often found to be very ungrateful, and, no matter what services a man may have rendered, he is often turned out to suffer in poverty and in want in his old age. I do not believe any officer has ever received recognition from this Government who deserved it more richly than does General "Baldy" Smith.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] moves to strike out the word "major-general," where it occurs in the bill, and insert the word "colonel."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Will my friend allow me, before he insists upon that motion, to read an extract from a letter from General Corse? We all know who General Corse is. He writes:

I remember hearing General Grant say that "Baldy Smith" (as we knew him more familiarly) was the only man he knew competent to succeed him in the command of the Army.

I have another letter from a gentleman, saying that he remembers hearing General Thomas say that General "Baldy" Smith saved the Army at Chattanooga. Now, Mr. Chairman, here is a man who saved an army, a man who enjoyed the rank of major-general when he retired from the service, and I do not think it is the proper thing to degrade him now to the rank of colonel in his old age.

I ask leave to present the following statements of the services rendered by General Smith during the campaigns at and near Gettysburgh and Chattanooga. These statements have been furnished to me by gentlemen who participated in those campaigns.

MOVEMENT OF A MILITIA DIVISION UNDER THE COMMAND OF BRIG. GEN. WILLIAM F. SMITH, UNITED STATES VOLUNTEERS, DURING THE GETTYSBURGH CAMPAIGN.

Toward the end of June, 1863, Brig. Gen. W. F. Smith was in command of a division of militia assembled on the right bank of the Susquehanna River opposite Harrisburg, Pa. The Army of Northern Virginia, under General R. E. Lee, was invading Maryland and Pennsylvania, its destination being then unknown. On the afternoon of June 30 the right of General Smith's position was assailed by a force of the enemy, showing cavalry, infantry, and artillery. This movement at the time was thought by some to be made by the advance guard of General Lee's army. General Smith thought otherwise, and made dispositions to capture the force, but the enemy evidently discovering this in time hastily departed. It proved to be General Imboden's command.

Permission to make an advance was granted by General D. N. Couch, the department commander, and the command started July 1 for Carlisle, General Smith reaching that point with an advance guard of about eighteen hundred men, shortly before General Fitzhugh Lee's division of Confederate cavalry arrived; dispositions were at once made for defending the town; the advance guard was shortly after cut off from the main body of militia; several demands for surrender were made, but were declined; the town was shelled during the night (July 1, 2), and Carlisle barracks, a lumber yard, and a gasometer, were fired by the enemy, the illumination from which increased the alarm at Harrisburg; some loss was suffered by the militia; the enemy left on the morning of July 2.

General Smith soon brought together his command, and without wagon-trains, moved toward the South Mountain; up to his arrival at the foot of the mountains he had no knowledge of the whereabouts of General R. E. Lee's main army, or of the battle of Gettysburgh having been commenced, no sound of battle even having been heard; on the morning of the 4th of July he learned for the first time, through an unofficial source, that a battle was in progress at or near Gettysburgh; he sent me at once to find General Meade and tell him that he "would be at Watt's Furnace (Pine Grove) with four brigades of militia, with artillery, that day;" a glance at the accompanying relief map will show that Pine Grove was in the rear of Lee's army, and a force there seriously threatened that army and its communications over the main road by which it had advanced. I found General Meade at his headquarters that afternoon and reported, in accordance with my instructions.

At his request I pointed out on the map the position of General Smith's command. The topography of that region admitted of concealing a small force, or of displaying it so it might appear an immense one. General Meade was made aware of General Smith's desire to plant his command across the Chambersburgh road. He ordered me to ride back at once to General Smith and "tell him to get out of there," saying, "I never ordered him there. He will be captured." Having been in the saddle many hours, my horse was played out, and I asked General Seth Williams, adjutant-general Army of Potomac, for an order for a remount. There were several general officers present, one of whom (Sedgwick, I think) remarked that Smith could take care of his command; whereupon, after a short consultation, General Meade directed me to remain in calling distance, which I did. I reported early on the 5th, but the retreat of Lee was announced shortly afterward, and I returned to General Smith, but General Meade sent written orders to him as well by a shorter road (covered by the enemy when I started), and which reached him before I did, preventing him from effecting his purpose of seizing the Chambersburgh road.

During this trip to the Army of the Potomac, on the 4th of July, I saw nothing at headquarters or anywhere else that indicated to me that an assured victory had been gained, and I had had previous experience with that army in several campaigns, and knew the feelings engendered by success or reverse. On the morning of the 5th, after word had been received of General Lee's retreat, and not until then, did I notice any elation, such as assured victory occasions to the successful army.

General Lee's main army retreated through the Fairfield Pass and a part under Imboden, with wagon trains, by the Chambersburgh road; the former was followed by Neill's brigade of the Sixth Corps, and General Smith moved down the mountains, reaching Waynesborough before Neill. For the first time after leaving Harrisburg rations were drawn, and from Neill's command; Smith's command subsisting during the march in such irregular ways as to barely prevent starving.

At Waynesborough the militia were associated with the Army of the Potomac, and a portion of them were engaged in battle at Hagerstown, losing men, but behaving well; after Lee crossed into Virginia they returned north.

The merits of this campaign may be summed up in the boldness of General Smith's advance immediately after General Imboden's attack at Harrisburg, in the midst of the consternation and alarm, which prevailed there as well as through the entire North, which nothing but his scientific military judgment would seem to justify; his defense of Carlisle, with a small force of raw militia, against a large command of veteran troops; his refusals to surrender (in fact, the militia at Carlisle was the magnet that attracted the sabers of Lee's army and kept them away at a time when, many writers on Gettysburgh admit, General R. E. Lee needed them most; General Smith held them there by refusing to surrender, and "with his nose between their teeth," as it were); his movement toward a large army in a position at first unknown to him; his occupying a position of great strategical and tactical importance in the rear of that army when its position was known to him; his avowed purpose of planting his command across the line of Lee's communications, from which he was prevented only by direct orders from General Meade; his reaching Waynesborough, in pursuit of Lee, in advance of the Army of the Potomac, and all this without subsistence trains and with half-starved men.

He undoubtedly made an earnest endeavor to render to the Army of the Potomac and the country the best service that could be rendered with the militia under his command during a very trying period.

PRESTON C. F. WEST,
Formerly Captain, A. D. C., and Topographical Engineer, Staff of General William F. Smith.

THE CAPTURE OF LOOKOUT VALLEY, TENNESSEE, BY THE SURPRISE AT BROWN'S FERRY, AND THE OPENING OF THE TENNESSEE RIVER, OCTOBER 27, 1863.

Of the condition of affairs at Chattanooga in October, 1863, General Grant in his Memoirs, says: "A retreat at this time would have been a terrible disaster. It would not only have been the loss of a most important strategic position to us, but it would have been attended with the loss of all the artillery still left with the Army of the Cumberland, and the annihilation of that army itself either by capture or demoralization.

"All supplies for Rosecrans had to be brought from Nashville. The railroad between this base and the army was in possession of the Government up to Bridgeport, the point at which the road crosses to the south side of the Tennessee River; but Bragg, holding Lookout and Raccoon Mountains, west of Chattanooga, commanded the railroad, the river, and the shortest and best wagon roads both south and north of the Tennessee, between Chattanooga and Bridgeport. The distance between these two places is but 26 miles by rail, but owing to the position of Bragg all supplies for Rosecrans had to be hauled by a circuitous route north of the river, and over a mountainous country, increasing the distance to over 60 miles.

"This country afforded but little food for his animals, nearly ten thousand of which had already starved, and not enough were left to draw a single piece of artillery or even the ambulances to convey the sick. The men had been on half rations of hard bread for a considerable time, with but few other supplies, except beef driven from Nashville across the country. * * * Nothing could be transported but food, and the troops were without sufficient shoes or other clothing suitable for the advancing season. What they had on was well worn. The fuel within the Federal lines was exhausted, even to the stumps of trees. There were no wagons to draw it from the opposite bank where it was abundant.

"If a retreat had occurred at that time it is not probable that any of the army would have reached the railroad as an organized body if followed by the enemy."

Of the plan for recovering the short line of supplies between Bridgeport and Chattanooga, Van Horne, the able historian of the Army of the Cumberland, in his "Life of General George H. Thomas," says that on the night of the 23d of October after the arrival of General Grant, General Thomas "made known to General Grant at once the scheme which had been devised for the relief of the Army. The plan had been perfected in all the details and needed only the approval of General Grant."

General Hooker had been ordered by General Rosecrans to concentrate all his available troops at Bridgeport, with a view to moving on the passes of Raccoon Mountain; but says Van Horne, "General Hooker could not move with safety from Bridgeport until measures had been taken to drive the enemy from the left bank of the Tennessee River. Had his command moved into Lookout valley before support was practicable from Chattanooga, General Bragg could have sent an overwhelming force against him, and the Army at Chattanooga would only have witnessed the failure of the effort to avert starvation."

General W. F. Smith made a reconnaissance of the river below Chattanooga on the 19th of October, and on the morning of the 20th submitted to General Thomas a plan for a co-operative movement by Hooker and forces from Chattanooga. This plan for the capture of Lookout Valley, if successful, allowed the Army of the Cumberland to strike in flank any force sent by Bragg to dispute the possession of the passes in Raccoon Mountain, and when Hooker entered Lookout Valley he would be in reality connected with the Army of the Cumberland by the bridge at Brown's Ferry and the troops holding the bridge head. Hooker was to move from Bridgeport at daylight on the 27th of October. Van Horne says this plan "provided that fifteen hundred men with a sufficient force of pontoniers should embark on pontons, and at night glide past Lookout Mountain, held almost to the edge of the water by the enemy's pickets, and debark on the left bank of the river just above Brown's Ferry."

For this service a part of General Hazen's brigade, under his own command, was taken. The remainder of this brigade, General Turchin's brigade, and the artillery were ordered to march across the peninsula formed by the course of the river, and take position on the wooded hill near the ferry to cover the troops on the pontons, should they fail to land on the left bank, or to join them on that bank in the event of their success. This expedition was eminently successful. The pontons hugging the right bank of the Tennessee glided by the frowning mountain, gleaming here and there with the evening's camp-fires, and the troops with slight opposition gained the left bank at the designated place.

A ponton bridge has soon thrown * * * and fortifications for the two brigades were constructed on the enemy's side of the river. Having accomplished all that the plan of operations required of them, these troops were in position to welcome Hooker's column to Lookout Valley in the evening. And then the Tennessee River from Bridgeport to Chattanooga was held by the co-operating forces. * * * The problem of supplies was thus brilliantly solved. The boldness of the plan, the nice adjustment of all its details, and the importance of the results place these operations among the prominent achievements of the war.

TO WHOM BELONGS THE CREDIT.

Van Horne, in his Life of General Thomas, says: "The definite plan was so evidently originated by General Smith that General Thomas gave him credit for its conception and execution. In his report to the Joint Committee on the Conduct of the War, he said: 'To Brig. Gen. W. F. Smith should be accorded great praise for the ingenuity which conceived, and the ability which executed the movement at Brown's Ferry. The preparations were all made in secrecy, as was also the boat expedition which passed under the overhanging cliffs of Lookout, so much so that when the bridge was thrown at Brown's Ferry, on the morning of the 27th, the surprise was as great to the army within Chattanooga as it was to the army besieging it from without.' General Bragg did not at first discover its full significance. * * * An open river and short lines of supply. * * * General Grant was as explicit as Thomas in denying any connection with the plan beyond approval. On the 26th of October he sent the following dispatch to Washington:

"'MAJOR-GENERAL HALLECK: * * * General Thomas had also set on foot, before my arrival, a plan for getting possession of the river from a point below Lookout Mountain to Bridgeport. If successful, and I think it will be, the question of supplies will be fully settled.'

"'U. S. GRANT, Major-General.'"

Two days later he again telegraphed in relation to this plan:

"'General Thomas's plan for securing the river and south side road hence to Bridgeport has proved eminently successful.'

"'U. S. GRANT, Major-General.'"

In a late criticism on the "Civil War in America," a most impartial work by the Comte de Paris, John C. Ropes, the able lawyer and distinguished military writer and critic, says: "For instance, in the account of the operations which resulted in the storming of Missionary Ridge, we are pleased to see that the count has adhered strictly to the exact facts, and has not been induced by his admiration of General Grant to overstate, as have some of his admirers, the part which that distinguished officer played in the success of the Federal Army. We find a cordial recognition of the important services rendered by General W. F. Smith in the planning and carrying out of the Brown's Ferry movement, which alone rendered it possible, not only to maintain the Army of the Cumberland at Chattanooga, but to bring to its assistance, first the corps of Hooker, and then that of Sherman. We find due recognition of the sound and sure judgment of the commanding general in availing himself at once of this skillful plan."

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I admit all that my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has said in relation to the distinguished services and great merits of General Smith. It may all be properly admitted, because it can not be denied. But General Smith at the time of his resignation, which was a voluntary act on his part, was holding the rank of colonel.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And brevet brigadier-general.

Mr. MATSON. Which was complimentary of course, but not a rank. If he had remained in the service, it is possible, as my friend has well said, that he would have become a major-general. But he did not remain in the service. The Government has not had his services since he was colonel. It seems to me it is a great deal to do to put him on the retired-list as a colonel, the rank which he held when he resigned from the Army. After all the distinguished service he rendered, that was his rank; and I submit that if this be done, it is doing a very great deal.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that distinguished officers, soldiers, and others who have rendered great service to the country ought to be treated well. But to put a man on the retired-list means a great deal more than giving him even a very large pension. It means in this case a pension (for it is nothing more nor less than a pension) of about $500 a month. If General Smith is placed on the retired-list as a colonel his retired pay will, I suppose, amount to $4,000 a year, at least $3,600—$300 a month—which is very large pay.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. A retired officer gets only three-quarters of the regular pay.

Mr. MATSON. I know that. But it seems to me the provision I have just suggested would be quite generous. I have no disposition to be captious. I think if General Smith be placed on the retired-list as a colonel he will have been very well treated by the Government.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it proper or wise to pass this bill in any form, for the reason that, in my judgment, when a soldier whom the Government has educated sees fit after some years given to its service to be lured out into the walks of private employment to spend there the flower of his life, it is improper after twenty-one years' absence on his part from the service of the Government to discriminate between him and all other citizens, to lift him up and put him back nominally in the service as a barnacle on the remainder of the community.

In saying this I do not mean any offense toward this soldier. I have no doubt he was a good soldier; I have no doubt he is a gentleman; I have no doubt he has that fine sense of honor and patriotism which is characteristic of so many of our people, and which is the great boast of American citizenship. Sir, the way to keep high the standard of American citizenship is to let every citizen feel that in the struggle of life he has an equal advantage with every other citizen, and that his Government is not going to tax a citizen who is making $300 or $400 a year by the sweat of his brow to pay a salary not earned in service to some other citizen at the rate of $4,000 or $5,000 or $6,000 a year.

It is wrong in principle; and if such a practice had never been adopted in any case it would have been better for the country. Having been adopted, the sooner it is abandoned the better.

In saying this I feel no opposition toward this soldier. This is the position I have taken in every one of these cases, because I believed it was sound. I opposed General Grant's retirement on the same ground. For similar reasons I opposed taking General Pleasonton from private life and bringing him forward for a position on the retired-list. There is no principle upon which a proceeding of this kind can be justified.

How many citizens of the United States are there who do not earn and can not earn $600 per annum, even if they should work their fingerends off? Yet we are asked to come forward here and take one citizen, put him in this favored position above the mass of other citizens, and pay him a salary of $4,000 or $5,000 per annum as holding a rank that he never held in the regular Army. You are putting him back into the Army, not for service but for retirement, for nothig else but that he may draw a large salary from the people. I do not believe this is right; I do not think patriotism demands it.

I listened with interest to the remarks of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] when he spoke of what would have been this man's experience if he had lived in some of the countries of Europe. Sir, our ancestors fought and bled and many of them died to break down the effete systems of Europe, where governments were pinned together with bayonets and manhood stood no chance.

I do not think this measure right, and for one I shall not favor it. If it is to be passed, certainly all that can be reasonably asked is that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] be adopted. And there is another amendment, to which I shall call attention later on, which ought to be adopted. But, as I have remarked, I do not believe measures of this kind right in principle. I think we should stop at the threshold. This House may not agree with me in the position I take. Members here may conclude that it is right to put one class of citizens on the necks of others and let them go riding over those who have to labor for their living. For one I do not favor any such principle. I think we ought to stop such a system quickly and effectually here, now, and forever.

The question recurred on Mr. MATSON's amendment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 1.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move to strike out the provision which increases the retired-list to that extent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That would simply defeat the purpose of the bill if adopted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The law fixes the number to go on the retired-list

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It would utterly destroy the bill. I do not wish to take up the time of the committee. Let the vote be taken.

Mr. McMILLIN. The question is whether the retired-list shall be swelled beyond its present proportions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to strike out these words: "the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent."

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask for a division on that amendment

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to strike out the words on the second page, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

But this proviso shall be no bar to any claim for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of said William F. Smith may have after his decease.

Mr. McMILLIN. My reason for offering this amendment is this: Under existing law the widow of a retired officer is not entitled to pension; but here it is proposed by this bill to reverse the whole policy of the law, to reverse the action heretofore taken by the Government, and I do not think it wise or proper.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. To save the bill I will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 19.

So the motion was agreed to, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The next bill is not in the Committee of the Whole. I therefore move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McCREARY having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let this bill lie over for a little while.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I would rather have it disposed of. It is where it can be voted on.

Mr. McMILLIN. It will retain its present status.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand it comes up as unfinished business.

Mr. McMILLIN. I only want it passed over for the present.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What is its status? Does it hold its place?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It retains its status at this evening session. The Chair hears no objection, and it is passed over for the present.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to save time I move that the bills be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman can not appreciate the work which this imposes upon the clerks at the desk. It confuses everything.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman ask for a vote on his motion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No, I do not.

Mr. STEELE. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 9298) releasing the estate of Asher R. Eddy, late lieutenant-colonel and quartermaster-general United States Army, deceased, and George W. Gibbs and R. L. Ogden, sureties on his official bond.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent to consider these bills in the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman that we are simply working our clerks well-nigh to death at the very best we can do, and it increases their labor a great deal to consider these bills in the House. For the relief of the clerks I ask that we consider them in the proper way, in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is the reason I made the motion——

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me suggest to the gentleman that a good part of this evening's session will be taken up by going in and out of committee. I would suggest, therefore, that all the bills in Committee of the Whole be considered before the committee rises.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That will somewhat disarrange our plans.

Mr. McMILLIN. My suggestion is to save the clerks from the amount of work in journalizing the business. We are working them very hard.

Mr. STEELE. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

ESTATE OF ASHER R. EDDY.

Mr. STEELE. I now call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 9298) releasing the estate of Asher R. Eddy, late lieutenant-colonel and quartermaster-general United States Army, deceased, and George W. Gibbs and R. L. Ogden, sureties on his official bond.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the estate of the late Asher R. Eddy, late lieutenant-colonel and deputy quartermaster-general United States Army, deceased, and George W. Gibbs and R. L. Ogden, sureties of the said late Asher R. Eddy on his official bond to the United States, bearing date September 5, A. D. 1872, be, and they are hereby, released from any liability that may have accrued in the office of said lieutenant-colonel and deputy quartermaster-general United States Army during his term of service, and the proper officer of the United States Treasury Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cancel and discharge said liability, whether the same be pending in court or has become a judgment.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the report.

The report (by Mr. STEELE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9298) for the relief of the estate of Asher R. Eddy, late lieutenant-colonel and deputy quartermaster-general United States Army, have carefully considered the same and agree with the Secretary of War and the Quartermaster-General of the Army that the passage of the bill "would be but an act of simple justice."

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, June 2, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, inclosing a communication from the Department of Justice, and Department letter of the 30th of April last, on the subject of House bill 9298, Fiftieth Congress, first session, to release the estate and sureties of the late Col. A. R. Eddy, and requesting an opinion as to the advisability of the passage of the bill.

In reply I beg to invite attention to the inclosed copy of an additional report on the subject from the Quartermaster-General, dated the 31st ultimo, and to inclose a copy of General Orders No. 10, Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant-General's Office, 1887.

I am of the opinion that under the circumstances of this case as they appear of record, the passage of the bill in question is desirable as an act of justice.

The papers accompanying your letter are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. R. W. TOWNSHEND,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 31, 1888.

Respectfully returned to the honorable the Secretary of War.

In the opinion of the undersigned, the bill relieving the bondsmen of Lieutenant-Colonel Eddy should pass as an act of simple justice. I am strengthened and confirmed in this opinion by the fact that Order No. 10, 1877, of the War Department, practically exonerated the principal, Lieutenant-Colonel Eddy, when the subject was under review and the facts were fresh in the minds of the authorities. Further, by the fact that a sum of money was secured by the Government from the real offender in the case exceeding in amount the liabilities of the bondsmen who seek relief under this bill.

S. B. HOLABIRD,
Quartermaster-General, United States Army.

Mr. MATSON. I would like to know as to the facts on which this report is based. What was the charge against this officer and his sureties?

Mr. STEELE. Colonel Eddy was a department quartermaster of the Army of California. Under him was a military storekeeper, and under the storekeeper was a clerk. The clerk got the checks for transportation, forged the signatures of the parties to whom they were made payable, and drew the money.

Mr. MATSON. What is the amount, about, of the deficit?

Mr. STEELE. I can not give the exact amount.

Mr. PERKINS. The Quartermaster-General says that more money was recovered by the Government than the amount of the claim.

Mr. MATSON. I am satisfied with the explanation.

Mr. COBB. I do not think there is a single fact disclosed in this report why it is that it is just and equitable to release these parties.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Did not the gentleman notice the statement that a larger amount had been recovered than the claim itself. Is that not enough?

Mr. MORROW. It is a formal release merely.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, FLORENCE, S. C.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN.]

Mr. TILLMAN. I move to take up the bill (H. R. 10869)——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that this bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Can we not consider it now, as we are in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. We are in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. It could not be done now even by unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then, if necessary, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the bill

H. R. 9298, had directed him to report the same to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope, in order to avoid going back into Committee, that we may have unanimous consent to consider these bills as in Committee of the Whole. The clerks tell me that it will convenience them by that arrangement.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the bill? I will not agree to the request as to all of these bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

A bill (H. R. 10869) to construct a road from Florence, S. C., to the national cemetery adjacent thereto.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection to considering that in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be used in the construction of a macadam or gravel road leading from the town of Florence, S. C., to the national cemetery in the vicinity of said town, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War: Provided, That no part of the money so appropriated shall be expended until the town of Florence shall, by proper ordinances, grant to the United States the right, without expense, to grade and macadamize the streets along the route selected for the construction or repair of said road, and also provide in said ordinance that when said road is constructed that said town will keep the same in repair within the incorporated limits of said town: And provided further, That no part of said money shall be expended until the county of Darlington shall, by proper orders duly entered of record in the proper court, widen the county road, if any, along the route selected, so as that it shall correspond in width to such streets of said town as may be selected for the purpose aforesaid: And provided further, That the contract to construct said road shall be awarded to the lowest bidder, after due advertisement, the Secretary of War to have authority to reject any and all bids.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report (by Mr. TILLMAN), as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9744) appropriating $10,000 for building a road from the town of Florence, S. C., to the national cemetery near said town, having had under consideration said bill, find that there are buried in the national cemetery at Florence, S. C., 3,005 Union soldiers. The grounds are inclosed within a brick wall, and embrace 3¾ acres of land, and are located about 1½ miles southeast of the railroad station. The civil engineer of the Quartermaster's Department reports that one of two routes is suggested: "The first being from the railway station via Church street, and the second is from the railway station via post-office and Dargan street."

The first route is 7,700 feet long; the second about 10,000. The last is preferred by the citizens of Florence. There would be somewhat less grading to do on it, but the cost would be about in proportion to the distance, as the cost of grading is a small item.

The total cost of the road on the first route suggested, it is estimated, would cost $18,000, and on the second route $22,200, as will be seen by the following letter from Quartermaster-General of the United States Army:

Mr. TILLMAN. I will simply say that the Quartermaster-General and the Secretary of War have recommended the passage of this bill. Only $15,000 is appropriated, whereas $18,000 was supposed to be the lowest estimate for building a good macadam or gravel road. I do not think it necessary, therefore, to consume the time of the House to have the letters of the Quartermaster-General and Secretary, which are appended to the report, read.

Mr. McMILLIN. The bill is ambiguous in one respect; that is, as to the construction of the road inside of the corporate limits of the town. Who does that, the Government or the town?

Mr. TILLMAN. Why, the town, of course; and the town is required to keep that portion of the road in repair.

Mr. McMILLIN. I saw as to the keeping in repair, but was uncertain as to the original construction.

Mr. TILLMAN. The original construction is also imposed upon the town.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF ASHER R. EDDY.

Mr. STEELE. I now call up the bill (H. R. 9298) releasing the estate of Asher R. Eddy, late lieutenant-colonel and quartermaster-general United States Army, deceased, and George W. Gibbs and R. L. Ogden, sureties on his official bond, reported from the Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEELE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATE HOMES.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD].

Mr. LAIRD. I ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the consideration of the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States, and that the same be considered in the House. It is a substitute for the bill H. R. 7939, which has been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs and is identical with it. I ask that the House bill lie on the table and that the Senate bill be considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska asks that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2116).

Mr. McMILLIN. The bill makes a considerable appropriation and I think it ought to receive consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. LAIRD. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all States which have established, or which shall hereafter establish, State homes for disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States who served in the war of the rebellion, or in any previous war, who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living, provided such disability was not incurred in service against the United States, shall be paid for every such disabled soldier or sailor who may be admitted and cared for in such home at the rate of $100 per annum. The number of such persons for whose care any State shall receive the said payment under this act shall be ascertained by the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, under such regulations as it may prescribe, but the said State homes shall be exclusively under the control of the respective State authorities, and the Board of Managers shall not have nor assume any management or control of said State homes. The Board of Managers of the National Home shall, however, have power to have the said State homes inspected at such times as it may consider necessary, and shall report the result of such inspections to Congress in its annual report.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $250,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act, and payments to the States under it shall be made quarterly by the said Board of Managers for the National Home for Disabled Volunteers to the officers of the respective States entitled, duly authorized to receive such payments, and shall be accounted for as are the appropriations for the support of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States."

The House report on the Senate bill (by Mr. LAIRD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of soldiers and sailors of the United States, having considered the same, report:

The bill (S. 2116) as amended and passed by the Senate is precisely identical with H. R. 7939, reported by this committee; therefore your committee recommend that S. 2116 be substituted for H. R. 7939 and passed, and that H. R. 7939 lay on the table.

Mr. LAIRD. The report in this instance is quite lengthy and contains a number of tables. If I can have the consent of the House I could state the substance in one fourth of the time that it will take the House to hear it read.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think it is a matter of so much importance and makes an appropriation of so much money that it ought to be read. We do not know how much.

Mr. LAIRD. We do know how much.

Mr. McMILLIN. How much?

Mr. LAIRD. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not think the time of the House will be wasted by the reading of the report.

Mr. COBB. Have we passed beyond the point of objection?

The CHAIRMAN. Objections can not be made to the consideration of bills under the order on which we are acting to-night, but such orders have been adopted heretofore. Under the order of to-night there is no such provision.

Mr. LAIRD. I ask that the report of the House bill be read, but there are a number of tables, the substance of which is contained in the body of the report, and I ask that the Clerk may be excused from reading these tables, which will take almost as much time to read as the reading of the body of the report.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no desire to consume the time of the House by reading tables if the information contained in the body of the report is given.

The report (by Mr. LAIRD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7939) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States, their widows and orphans, having considered the same, submit the following report:

There are now in existence, supported by appropriations by the General Government, the following national homes for the care of volunteer ex-soldiers and sailors of the United States, disabled in any war, namely: Dayton, Ohio; Milwaukee, Wis.; Leavenworth, Kans.; Togus, Me.; Hampton, Va., and the recently-located branch of the National Home at Los Angeles, Cal.

The following report, taken from the 1887 report of the Board of Managers of these homes, shows the number of soldiers furnished from the various States and Territories of the Union during the war, and the number of the survivors thereof now being cared for at the National Homes:

Comparative statement of the number of men furnished by the States during the civil war and the number cared for by the National Home from date of organization to June 30, 1887.

From this it appears that in the period covered by the table the number so cared for amounts to 42,605.

The following statement, taken from the same authority, shows the increase and the ratio of the increase in the number cared for at the homes from 1883 to 1887:

"The average numbers of members present during the last five fiscal years are as follows:

Year ending June 30—

"It appears, therefore, that the actual number present through the whole year has increased in five years 2,980, or 44 per cent. The number present and absent has increased in the same period from 8,480 during the year ending June 30, 1883, to 12,168 for the year ending June 30, 1887."

An inquiry into the capacity of the present homes to care for those entitled to admission therein under existing law shows that at the present time every branch home, unless it be the Western Branch, is so crowded that inmates are compelled to sleep on the floors. And this is true notwithstanding the fact that the capacity of the homes has been increased by the erection during the last year of temporary barracks for the accommodation of 1,000 additional men.

Speaking on the subject of the number of ex-soldiers and sailors entitled under the law to admission to the homes and to the want of capacity to care for them, the Board of Managers, in their report for 1885, say this:

"The increase in the membership of the National Home (and branches) has been constant, and for reasons referred to hereafter the percentage of increase has been greater than it has been for many years. * * *

"Four branches of the Home (all except that at Leavenworth) now contain more than double the number of men for which they were originally built. The capacities of these branches should not, in the opinion of the Board, be further increased, and the limit of size of the branches now existing should be considered to have been reached, a membership of 1,500 being, from the experience of the Board, as large as any branch should have.

"It is impossible to tell how long the membership of the Home will increase under the present law. It is safe to say, however, that it is not probable that the number will begin to diminish for at least ten years, and that there will be an increase up to that time at least. There are now fully one thousand men who have applied for admission to the Home who are fully entitled to admission under the law. They can not be admitted, first, because there are no places for them; and, second, because there is not enough money appropriated for their support."

Again the board, in their report for 1886 (June 30), says:

"The question, how long the membership of the Home will increase, still remains unsolved. Under the law every soldier who is disabled and who can not earn his living is entitled to admission to the home whether his disability can be traced to service in the Army or not. This law was enacted on July 5, 1884. During the past three years the number of those admitted on account of wounds received in action or disability incurred in service has materially fallen off.

"On the other hand, the number admitted on account of age and disability incurred since the war has increased, so that the annual number of admissions continually increases. These causes of increase will continue as the soldiers grow older, and the membership of the Home must increase for an indeterminate series of years so long as Congress furnishes the means for such increase. The existing branches of the Home are now filled to their utmost capacity, and, in the opinion of the board, only one, or at most two, of them should be further enlarged."

It will be remembered in connection with the above extract that until the passage of the act of July 5, 1884, no sailor, however wounded or helpless, could be admitted to any home for disabled soldiers; and, indeed, could be cared for only at one place in the United States, and that the marine hospital in Philadelphia. Nor could any soldier be received into a home except for disabilities contracted in the line of duty in the service.

So overcrowded are the national homes at present that the managers, at their annual meeting for 1888, recommended the appropriation of $150,000 to be used in the construction of temporary barracks at the several branches of the Home, humanity in their judgment demanding that some additional effort be made by the Government to care for the disabled veterans, as it had agreed to do by law. This bill has passed the Senate of the United States, and is now pending on the Calendar of the House, having been unanimously reported from this committee.

The data so far presented demonstrates the incapacity of the present homes to provide for the increasing demand under existing law for hospitality. A reference to the extracts cited from the various board reports shows, first, that the number of those dependent and entitled to care under the law will increase for at least five to seven years yet; and second, that an increase in the number of dependents at the demonstrated rate stated by the board would add some twenty thousand to the list of those now received into, or known to be entitled to be received into, the homes under existing law.

In the opinion of your committee the number above stated will not cover the number of those entited to relief, and is less than the actual number will be, by thousands; and we base our conclusion on this fact, that of the 2,700,000 men enrolled for the war at least 1,000,000 are now alive. Taking the average age of a soldier at the expiration of the war to be thirty years, these survivors are now fifty-three years of age, and upon them, from this age to the end of life, time, aided by the hardships of war, will tell terribly upon constitutions undermined in the service of the country, and as a consequence drive them, where dependent, to seek the protection which a great Government ought justly and generously to give.

Two facts, in a very marked degree, confirm the conclusion of your committee that the country is now entering upon the period when it is to see the maximum of the suffering of its defenders, and must, in consequence, widen its policy to meet the increasing demand, or narrow it, and deserting the men that saved it, leave them to the mercy of private or municipal charity. Your committee do not believe the lives of these patriots were spared for such a fate. This is a Christian and civilized nation, and it will do its duty by these men as they did their duty by it.

The first of the facts referred to is the number of veterans dependent on public charity in the several States and Territories, as shown by the following table:

And the second is the necessity which has impelled the various States to expend the following sums of money in providing local State protection for the disabled veterans residing within their limits:

In California	$75,000
For support, probably annually	15,000
In Connecticut, buildings and support for only two years	147,000
In Illinois, annually, for support	430,000
And that State has expended on Soldier's Orphan Home and support thereof	1,155,446
In Iowa, for buildings	100,000
And for buildings and support of orphans	1,188,555
In Kansas, for orphans of and soldiers, and for buildings (and has but just opened a Soldiers' home; no figures at hand)	80,000
In Michigan, for buildings	160,000
For support, annually	145,000
In Minnesota, Orphans' Home and support (has just erected a State home)	110,000
In Missouri (no State home) for orphans	42,500
In New Jersey, Newark State home	695,000
For a new State home building	125,000
In New York, buildings and grounds	203,000
For support per annum, about	100,000
In Ohio, buildings and grounds	150,000
In Pennsylvania, buildings, State home	250,000
For support, per annum (estimated)	230,000
And for orphans	625,000

To this can be added Nebraska, which is just completing a home for its veterans at a cost of $75,000.

In addition to these sums, aggregating over $6,000,000, expended in plants by the States named, it appears from data that has come under your committee's observation that the State of Massachusetts has expended in providing for her veterans, their widows and orphans, the sum of $18,000,000, and Wisconsin, for the same purpose, $11,000,000. These facts not only tell the story of the needs of the class in question, but they demonstrate by example the duty of the General Government. The argument of these millions points, if not to the neglect, then to the oversight of the General Government, and its force should hasten considerate action. When the patriotism of the States answers the appeal of its soldier citizens for relief to the extent of from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 in payment of an obligation resting primarily upon the people as a nation, it is time for Congress, representing the whole people, to act, and assume at least a part of a responsibility wholly national.

Your committee believe that both justice to the soldier and the tax-payer demand that the nation should charge itself with the protection of these men in their need, who in its need protected it. Nor will this obligation of honor and patriotism ever be lessened in the estimation of high-minded persons by the fact that the beneficiaries of this bill, while defending their country, were often overtaken by disaster in their business, which now, through years of varying struggle and lapsing powers of mind and body, has at last ripened into utter and hopeless ruin, leaving them stricken with age and the infirmities begotten of exposure and service, stranded and desolate, with no hand, save that of chance or public charity, to stay them as they totter down the slope of life toward the grave.

Your committee dismisses at once any thought that Congress will refuse to adopt some policy of relief, and submits that if it proposes to meet the responsibilities of the occasion and provide for such soldiers as are entitled to admission to the homes under existing law, legislation is required—

1. To establish additional branches of the Home; or
2. To materially enlarge existing branches; or
3. To encourage the States to establish State homes; or
4. To make appropriations for outdoor relief to those who can not be admitted to existing homes.

Of these obvious alternatives, your committee has selected the one which in their considerate judgment promises the most satisfactory, as well as the speediest, solution of the problem, namely, "To encourage the States to establish State homes."

In this conclusion the committee has the unqualified support of the present Board of Managers of the National Homes, all of whom concurred in the opinion expressed by General Franklin, its president, which is as follows:

"The board, is opposed, totally opposed, to the construction of other permanent homes, provided Congress will relieve existing homes and care for those entitled to care under the law, by granting aid to State homes. And it is the unanimous judgment of the board that national aid to the States is the true policy."

As early as June 30, 1886, the Board of Managers outlined the policy of aid to States as follows:

"The survivors of the war are growing old, their disabilities are severer, and the number who are unable to support themselves is for these reasons rapidly increasing. Notwithstanding the fact that a new home, capable of providing for 1,500 additional members, has recently been completed at Leavenworth, Kans., there are yet many disabled and destitute soldiers cared for in the almshouses of the country. Several of the States have endeavored to provide for this emergency by the erection of State homes. Illinois, Ohio, Iowa, Michigan, and Pennsylvania have recently established State homes, and such homes have for some time been established in New York, California, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Jersey, Connecticut, and in a few other States. If Congress should provide by law for assisting in maintaining the soldiers admitted to these State homes by authorizing the Board of Managers to pay one-half of the cost of supporting each soldier thus provided for, the necessity of building additional homes might be avoided, except in the case of that recommended for the Pacific slope."

In recommending the adoption of this policy and the passage of this bill your committee is not unmindful of the important evidence and opinion bearing on the matter furnished to this committee through exhibits attached to the Senate report on this subject, and which are hereto attached and made a part hereof.

As the provisions for the distribution of the sum covered in this bill would be complex and intricate, your committee have decided to leave that matter to the Board of Managers of the existing soldiers' homes, whose experience and accountability guaranty safety to the fund, and its practical application to the object sought.

For the reasons set forth herein, your committee recommend that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

Amend the title by striking out the words "their widows and orphans."

Amend line 6 of the bill by adding, after the word "war" therein, the words "who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living, provided such disability was not received in service against the United States."

Amend line 7 by striking out the following words therein, "and widow and orphan thereof."

Amend line 8 by striking out the words "for one year the sum" where the same appear therein, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "At the rate of."

Amend line 9 by adding, after the word "dollars" therein, the words "per annum."

APPENDIX.

EXHIBIT A.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Hartford, March 16, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of March 1, to his excellency Governor Lounsbury of Connecticut, inclosing copy of Senate bill No. 2116, has been referred to me by the governor for reply.

This State has a soldiers' home, which was first established by private benevolence for soldiers and children of soldiers. It was incorporated by the Legislature of this State in 1874, and was continued in a small way until 1883, when it was first aided by the State paying weekly board for inmates and so continued until the State assumed control. In 1886 the sum of $15,000 was appropriated for additional buildings. In January, 1887, the Legislature provided for the transfer of the management to the State, appropriating $17,000 for additional land and buildings, and in addition thereto appropriated $147,000 for the care of soldiers in home and State hospitals for two years, ending June 30, 1889.

The home was transferred to State control May 1, 1887, and is managed by a board called the Soldiers' Hospital Board, composed of the governor, adjutant-general, surgeon-general ex officio, and three Grand Army of the Republic veterans nominated by the department commander and appointed by the governor. The governor and all present members of the board, except surgeon-general, are members of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The average number present at the home during the first four months of the year 1887, under the old management, was 103; for the last nine months of the year the average was 125. In addition to the above the State supported in hospitals during the year an average of 50 at a cost of $6 per week each, and an average of 20 in the State Hospital for Insane. This State makes no provision for the care of soldiers outside of the above-named institutions.

A fund of $20,000, which came from private benevolence, is kept as a permanent fund, the income to be used for the benefit of the home.

The foregoing information comprises, I think, all that is asked for in your letter, but as you requested suggestions from the governor, I take the liberty of offering a few for your consideration.

Your bill is, in my opinion, an eminently just one, placing the cost of caring for the disabled veteran on the General Government, where it rightly belongs, and making the States lately in rebellion, who caused all the expense, pay a portion (a very small one it is true) of the cost.

1. I wish that the sum appropriated might be increased to $150 per man. The cost to this State at the home for last six months of 1887 was about $3 per week per man, which included board, clothing, tobacco, and medicines.

2. The cost for those in hospitals as stated above was $6 per week, and I think whatever amount is fixed upon the bill should be made to include those supported in hospitals as well as in the homes.

3. The inmates of the Home are transient, the number being much larger in winter than in summer, and comparatively few remain steadily a year.

Should not the bill be made to pay so much per average number present during each quarter?

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

FREDERICK E. CAMP,
Adjutant-General and Executive Officer Soldiers' Hospital Board.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate.

STATE OF ILLINOIS, EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Springfield, March 5, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your communication of the 1st instant, inclosing copy of a bill "to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States and their widows and orphans," has been received.

I have this day directed the superintendent of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Home at Quincy, Ill., Maj. J. G. Rowland, to transmit to you at the earliest practicable day the information you desire in regard to the date of the establishment of the home, the number of its inmates, etc. I think the passage of such a bill would be a judicious appropriation of public moneys, especially any surplus revenue which may be lying idle in the Treasury at the present moment.

The United States could in no more acceptable way testify its regard for the soldiers of the Republic than by such a measure. I ought perhaps to state that the act of our Legislature of 1885, creating the home, makes no provision for caring for the widows and orphans of soldiers. We have provided excellent cottages for their accommodation, and therefore have an excellent home admirably equipped in every respect for the purpose for which the Legislature created it. It is very prudently and economically managed, and all of our Illinois soldiers find comfortable homes there.

My impression is that the number present and absent is not far from 600. I believe there are over 500 present in the institution at this time. Major Rowland will, however, communicate with you on the subject.

Yours, respectfully,

R. J. OGLESBY.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

ILLINOIS SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME,
Quincy, Ill., March 7, 1888.

SIR: The governor of Illinois has referred to me your letter of 1st instant concerning this home, with the request that I supply the desired information.

The Illinois Soldiers and Sailors' Home was established by act of general assembly June 26, 1885. It was opened for reception of soldiers March 15, 1887, and is supported exclusively by State appropriations.

Total number of members admitted to date	700
Present enrollment	598
Members present	525

I will cheerfully furnish any other information which may be deemed of service to you.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. G. ROWLAND, Superintendent.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

IOWA EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Des Moines, March 7, 1888.

DEAR SIR: I am instructed by Governor Larrabee to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, and to state in reply that our general assembly of 1886 passed a bill for the establishment of an Iowa Soldiers' Home. The home was subsequently located at Marshalltown; it was completed last year and formally opened for the reception of inmates on the 30th of November. The report of the commandant for January shows that 91 inmates were being cared for in the home on the last day of that month.

The home was built at a cost of about $75,000, and it is supported by a direct appropriation made by the State.

I am also instructed to assure you that the governor is in hearty sympathy with the object of your bill, and that he hopes you may succeed in having it enacted into law.

Very respectfully, yours.

FRED'K W. HOSSELD,
Private Secretary.

Hon. CHAS. F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

STATE OF KANSAS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Topeka, March 5, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of March 1, inclosing a copy of Senate bill No. 2116.

There is no State home for soldiers in Kansas. We have established a home for sold ers' orphans, and it now has about 100 inmates. But we have no home for soldiers that is maintained by the State.

I heartily approve of your bill to provide aid for State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States. The Board of Managers has recommended such action in its annual report to Congress. This recommendation was made at my suggestion and on my motion. I had noticed that homes have been established in a number of States, and it seemed to me unjust that the State should be taxed to support men who were disabled in the service of the United States.

Yours, very respectfully,

JOHN A. MARTIN.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Frankfort, March 10, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of 1st instant, inclosing copy of Senate bill No. 2116, was duly received. For reply I would state that Kentucky has no "State Soldiers' Home." While I sympathize with the soldiers of our Republic who may have incurred any of the various forms of disability incident to military service, I think such persons are peculiarly the wards of the nation, and as such should be liberally provided for at the national expense.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

S. B. BUCKNER,
Governor of Kentucky.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MINNESOTA SOLDIERS' HOME, St. Paul, Minn., March 9, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of March 2 to Governor McGill has been referred to me for reply.

The State of Minnesota has a State Soldiers' Home, established by a law passed in March, 1887. It is now located in temporary quarters at Minnehaha Falls (between St. Paul and Minneapolis), and near the permanent grounds on which buildings will at once be erected. The temporary home was opened November 15, 1887, and now has fifty-eight inmates, its full capacity of accommodation. We have at least forty more applications, which we have been obliged to decline on account of lack of room, but we are helping the applicants from our "outside relief fund," at various places, until we can provide for them.

It is safe to say that there are at least one hundred and fifty homeless ex-soldiers (without families) in this State, who should be immediately gathered into our State home, and will be as soon as buildings can be provided. And the number will rapidly increase. We shall build with a view to a maximum capacity of eight hundred or one thousand men. The State does not regard it as primarily its duty to care for these veterans, but the National Homes can not take them, and as soon as it was found that many of them were drifting into poorhouses the Grand Army of the Republic took the matter up, and this is the result.

I inclose copies of the report of the secretary of our board. From this you will see that we have an outside relief fund from which we are caring for hundreds of men living at home with their families, who would otherwise be eligible for admission to the home. It is a very valuable feature, but is also doing the work which should beldone by the National Government, and which we will be largely released from if the Senate pension bill becomes a law.

Both the governor and myself think very highly of the principle of your law. But we think that the allowance to the States should be increased to at least $150 per annum for each inmate. Even then it would reach less than half the cost of maintenance, counting interest and repairs of buildings, etc. We are keeping there men confortably, not as paupers to be starved, but as invalids to be nourished. The average age of our inmates is about sixty years, and 40 per cent. of them are fit subjects for medical treatment.

The report of the secretary, which I inclose, was made February 13. Since then the number of inmates has increased, as stated, to fifty-eight, and the applications for outside relief and disbursements of same have increased in still greater proportion. The fact is that the facts as to the law and its operation have only just begun to be disseminated throughout the State, and it is only when the work is fully organized in every county that its full necessity and benefits will be appreciated.

I will be glad at any time to furnish any information in my power on this subject.

Very truly, yours,

HENRY A. CASTLE.

Senator C. F. MANDERSON.

STATE OF NEBRASKA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Lincoln, March 7, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 2d instant, inclosing copy of bill to provide aid for State homes for support of disabled soldiers, sailors, etc., has been received. In reply to your inquiries I have the honor to state that the Legislature of this State one year ago enacted a law providing for the establishment of a soldiers' home at Grand Island, Nebr. The main building is now nearly completed. No one has yet been received into it. When occupied the inmates are to be supported by appropriations from the State.

The act provides for receiving into the institution all soldiers and sailors "who have become disabled 'by reason of such service' in the late war of the rebellion," old age, or other causes, from earning a livelihood, and who would be dependent on public and private charity; and also wives of such soldiers and sailors, and their children under the age of fifteen years, and the widows, and children under the age of fifteen years, of soldiers, sailors, and marines who died while in the service of the United States, or who were honorably discharged from such service and who have since died, etc.

The act establishing this home contemplates the erection of cottages, each on a lot of 2½ acres, so that the veterans who are able may do a little in the way of cultivation.

The act creating the home was approved March 4, 1887.

I have no suggestions to make in reference to the bill, except to call attention to the word "disabled." I trust that that word as used in this act does not refer alone to soldiers disabled by wounds, but to such also as are disabled by reason of service in the war of the rebellion, or by old age and other causes, from earning a livelihood.

I most heartily indorse this measure, and trust that in the interest of justice this will become a law.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN M. THAYER.

STATE OF OHIO, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Columbus, March 14, 1888.

SIR: Answering your communication of the 2d instant, the State of Ohio is now building a Soldiers' and Sailors' home at Sandusky, Ohio. We are building it on what is known as the cottage plan. The administration building and a number of cottages will be completed and ready for occupation by June 1 next. It was provided for by act of the General Assembly of date April 30, 1886. The State has appropriated for its construction $150,000. More will be appropriated as needed until it is finished, at which time it is expected to accommodate about 1,200 inmates.

We have also at Xenia, Ohio, a home for the orphans of soldiers and sailors, which accommodated during the year 1887 about seven hundred inmates.

Allow me to suggest that your bill should be amended so as to reimburse each State for each soldier's orphan it is supporting in a home such as ours at Xenia.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

J. B. FORAKER.

Hon. CHAS. F. MANDERSON,
Washington, D. C.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Harrisburg, March 3, 1888.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of the 2d instant, inclosing copy of Senate bill 2116, entitled "A bill to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States and their widows and orphans," has been received. We have a State home in Pennsylvania, located in the city of Erie. It was established in pursuance of the provisions of the act of June 3, 1885. It has been in active operation for nearly two years. The number of inmates at present is about 250. Of these some 10 to 15 are absent on leave, making the actual number present in the home about 240.

We are making large additions to the buildings just now, so that we expect to be able to accommodate within the next six months about six hundred in all. It is a distinctively State institution, built with State funds, managed by a board of trustees provided for in the original act establishing the home, and is maintained by State appropriations. No one is admitted to the home except those who served in Pennsylvania regiments during the war of the rebellion and have been honorably discharged from the service and are without means of livelihood. Great care is exercised when admitting the inmates to see that their record of service is all right. I can not see, under the circumstances, why the General Government should not provide for the men who are there assembled, and it seems to me that the provisions of your bill are entirely proper.

We will probably expend $250,000 in buildings and equipment, in addition to the value of the ground and buildings which the State had on hand, and which had been intended originally for a marine hospital.

The provisions of your bill do not, as far as I can see, conflict in any way with the proper management of our home, or of any other which may have been or may hereafter be established under State supervision and authority. The beneficial effects of the bill will, in my judgment, be better than an indiscriminate service pension, or even a general dependent pension bill, inasmuch as the bounty of the Government will go to the men who are in actual and pressing need of it.

Whilst our State will not hesitate to provide for these men in the manner in which it is now doing it, it is nevertheless true that the provision should be made by the General Government, and the State in contributing toward this worthy object is simply lifting so much of legitimate burden from the shoulders of the Government.

Very cordially, yours,

JAMES A. BEAVER.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, MICHIGAN, Lansing, March 9, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 1st instant, making inquiries in relation to the Michigan Soldiers' Home, at hand. A home for disabled Michigan soldiers and sailors was established by act of our Legislature in June, 1885. It was completed and dedicated on the 31st of December, 1886. The building, furniture, and equipments have cost $160,000. It has provisions for three hundred and eighty inmates, but is now overcrowded, and four hundred are accommodated.

About $145,000 for the current expenses of 1887 and 1886 were appropriated, making an annual average expense of about $200 each. The plan works to the general satisfaction of the old soldiers and citizens of the State.

Very truly, yours,

C. G. LUCE, Governor.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Trenton, March 6, 1888.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I send you the last annual report of the managers of the New Jersey Home for Disabled Soldiers. It was organized under an act passed in 1866, and has a permanent annual appropriation of $25,000 for its support. An additional amount of $10,000 has been appropriated this year for its proper maintenance.

The State has made an appropriation of $125,000 for the purchase of property and the erection of suitable buildings, which are now about completed, and will be occupied in the spring.

I also send extracts from my annual message and from the report of the comptroller, which will give you more in detail the statistics.

Very truly, yours,

ROBERT S. GREEN.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
Washington, D. C.

[Extract from message.]

SOLDIERS' HOME.

By the report of the managers it appears that there were 328 inmates on the 31st of October, 1887. There were admitted during the year 329; discharged, 269; expelled, 12; died, 35. The average number of inmates was 329 per day. Of the inmates of the home during the year 513 served in New Jersey regiments.

Fourteen thousand seven hundred and twenty-five have been cared for since the home was opened. The total receipts for the year, including the balance on hand October 31, 1886, was $33,814.29. The expenses for the same time were $32,592.79. Balance on hand October 31, 1887, $1,221.50. The value of farm and dairy products consumed was $1,557.22. The additional amount needed for the proper maintenance of the home during the present fiscal year is $20,000.

One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars was appropriated for the purpose of the erection of a Home for Disabled Soldiers, and the purchase of the necessary property on which to build the same. The managers, to whom this important work was intrusted, secured an excellent plot of ground upon the banks of the Passaic River, and have been engaged during the year in the erection of the buildings necessary for that purpose.

The care of those who are disabled from earning their own livelihood, in consequence of wounds received or of sickness contracted in the service of their country in time of war, is a sacred trust upon the people of the State. They gave up all the comforts of home, abandoned the pursuit of business, and devoted their lives, health, and energies to the defense of the Union. They should be the wards of the State, and it should be our care, when they become and are unable to provide for themselves or their families, to look after them, make their future pathway in life as pleasant as possible, and do all that we can to secure their comfort and alleviate their suffering.

BATH, STEUBEN COUNTY, NEW YORK, March 12, 1888.

DEAR GENERAL: Absence at Albany on official business has prevented an earlier reply to your favor of the 2d instant, and I take pleasure in answering your queries in their order, namely:

The New York State Soldiers' and Sailors' home is a State institution and was originally organized by the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New York, and the original building erected under its auspices by voluntary contributions from members of the order and citizens of the State.

It was opened on Christmas day in the year 1878, and early in 1879 was turned over to the State on condition that the Legislature would provide for its maintenance, which it has done liberally up to this time.

Three years ago an appropriation of $50,000 was also made for the construction of additional barracks. Previous to the erection of the new barracks the capacity of the home was about 700. We can now accommodate 1,000, with a number of applications which we have been compelled to deny.

We have applied to the Legislature for an appropriation for additional buildings, which will no doubt be granted.

The number present and absent September 30, 1887, was	924
Present September 30, 1887	759
Discharged and dropped during year ending September 30, 1887	498
Died during year ending September 30, 1887	68
Admitted during year ending September 30, 1887	554
Average number present daily during year ending September 30, 1887	852
Present and absent March 12, 1888	1,062
Present March 12, 1888	991
Number of acres of land, 350; value	$21,600.00
Cost of buildings	182,305.50

The appropriation by the Legislature for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1888, for maintenance and ordinary repairs was $110,000.

As your bill provides that the sum to be awarded to the State homes shall be made under such regulations as may be established by the Board of Managers of the National Home, I have no suggestions to offer. I have no doubt they will carry out the intent of Congress in a satisfactory manner.

I have the honor to be, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. F. ROGERS, Superintendent.

HON. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

STATE OF VERMONT, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Brandon, March 15, 1888.

DEAR SIR: Your favor having reference to and making inquiry as to the subject of soldiers' home in Vermont, with inclosure, was duly received, and in reply I have to say that there is a soldiers' home at Bennington, in this State, established and maintained by the State, the same having been established under the provisions of act No. 189 of the session laws of Vermont, A. D. 1884, entitled "An act to incorporate the trustees of the soldiers' home in Vermont," and by act No. 228 of the same session of the Legislature, entitled "An act making appropriation for the trustees of the soldiers' home," the sum of $10,000 was appropriated by the State for the use of said trustees, and by act No. 214 of the session laws of 1886 a further appropriation of a like sum for the same purpose was made by the State.

Through the generosity and liberality of individuals the State has a home, a fine farm containing about 200 acres, formerly the residence of a retired gentleman, which makes a pleasant and beautiful place for our disabled and needy veterans. Nearly all of the first appropriation was required to reconstruct, repair, and furnish the building. The home was not in condition to receive applicants until May, 1887, when it was opened. Up to this time there have been thirty-nine inmates, two of whom have died, one furloughed, and one discharged, so that there are now thirty-five inmates, with a large number of applicants who can not be received, only as vacancies occur, for want of room.

The trustees intend to so enlarge the accommodations by erecting additional buildings by early summer that they can accommodate from eighty to one hundred in all. It is my opinion that by next summer we shall be in great need for room and accommodations to the full extent contemplated by the trustees, i. e., from eighty to one hundred, and it seems to me that the number must increase from year to year for from fifteen to twenty-five years to come, unless the pension laws of the United States shall be so changed as to include a class not now covered by laws having reference to pensions.

It is gratifying, indeed, to see a move in the direction contemplated by Senate bill 2116. Our veterans should and must be so provided for as to keep them from the doors of the poor-house, and this duty can not be in better hands than that of the General Government they helped to save. You ask me to make suggestions. Very well. Let me call your attention to the language in section 1, line 7, "and widow or orphan thereof who may be admitted and cared for in such home," etc. I am at a loss to conclude what is meant or intended by this language. Is it intended to render this aid for the "widow or orphan" at the home? If not, then wherein and under what regulations, etc., is the proposed act broad enough to accomplish the purpose in view, having reference to the "widows and orphans?"

I am, sir, very truly, yours,

EBENEZER J. ORMESBEE,
Governor of Vermont.

HON. CHAS. F. MANDERSON,
United States Senator.

STATE OF WISCONSIN,
STATE BOARD OF CHARITIES AND REFORM,
Madison, March 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: At the request of the governor's private secretary, I write you in relation to the Wisconsin Veterans' Home. He tells me that you have introduced a bill in the Senate giving aid to State soldiers' homes.

The Wisconsin Veteran's Home was proposed by the department encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic February 15, 1887. I was a member of the committee to which the subject was referred of asking for a State soldiers' home. As secretary of the State Board of Charities and Reform I was able to assure the committee that no State institution of any kind would be built during this financial period on account of the condition of the State finances and the demands of the State University. On my advice it was decided to establish a home of our own, asking for State aid. We secured such legislation without any difficulty.

We now have 70 acres of land on a beautiful lake at Waupaca, and buildings which now contain 51 inmates, nearly the full capacity at present.

We received $3 a week from the State for each inmate who was an honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine of the civil war, or for a woman who was the wife of such during the war. We shall ask to have this extended to the wives and widows of soldiers who were married since the war, with some precautions to prevent imposition.

We have a fair sized central building, and six cottages for two each, usually a soldier and his wife. We expect to enlarge this summer by adding cottages, which will be contributed by posts of the Grand Army of the Republic and corps of the Woman's Relief Corps. We hope to build twenty-five such cottages this summer.

The appropriation from the State is ample to cover all current expenses and make some minor improvements, but not to put up buildings. For these we expect to rely upon the Grand Army of the Republic, the Woman's Relief Corps, and citizens like Senators SAWYER and SPOONER, who have each contributed liberally.

We expect to make it a home as nearly as it is possible to make any institution a home. Our specialty will be to receive the soldiers with their wives. Single men are well provided for in the national homes, except for two evils, the overcrowding and the unnecessary expense in providing elegance rather than comfort, which is the great fault of most public institutions. But married men must leave their wives to enter a national home. We shall also receive the widows of soldiers, most of whom do not get pensions.

Will you do us the favor to so arrange your bill as to include us in it, if we are not already so included? The title to the property is in a corporation called the Wisconsin Veterans' Home. The members of the Department Encampment of Wisconsin, Grand Army of the Republic, are members of the corporation, which is managed by a board of trustees, elected by them.

Yours, respectfully,

A. O. WRIGHT, Secretary Trustees.

HON. C. F. MANDERSON.

Letters have also been received from many other governors of States where State soldiers' homes have not been established, and it is a fact worthy of note that in no instance has there been adverse criticism of the bill herewith reported.

General W. B. Franklin, president of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in a letter dated January 31, 1888, to Senator HAWLEY, says:

"Some legislation is necessary in the direction of increasing the number of the branches of the national homes or in giving national aid to State homes, with such restrictions as to the expenditures of the money as may be found to be proper. But the legislation should not be confined to a home in one State. It should be general, and apply to all of the State homes, and there are now many of them. It seems to me, therefore, that legislation giving money to one State home is objectionable, considering the large number of State homes that have been long established and supported at the cost of the various States which have hitherto received no help from Congress."

In another letter, dated February 2, 1888, to General T. S. Peck, of Burlington, Vt., General Franklin says:

"We have 12,500 old soldiers in the National Home to-day. Every foot of space is occupied, and yet hundreds are kept out from want of room. I believe the best way to supplement the National Home is to assist the State homes, but I think the assistance should be given to all of them and be a general law."

General M. T. McMahon, of New York, writes as follows to General Peck:

"OFFICE OF THE UNITED STATES MARSHAL,
"SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK,
"New York, February 2, 1888.

"MY DEAR GENERAL: Your letter of the 31st is received. I expect to see General Franklin and go with him to Washington in a few days, and will do what I can to carry out your views. The trouble as to the State homes has been that with the exception of the State of New York the appropriations necessary for their support are not to be counted on, and I have frequently, in conversation with General Franklin and other members of the board, discussed the matter, and I think the sentiment of the board is in favor of an act of Congress authorizing the board to pay a certain sum towards the support of those institutions per capita for the number of the men maintained in them.

"The National Homes are overcrowded, and while I think myself it would be better that a larger number of branches of the National Home should be created, yet while the States are willing to establish and maintain homes for their own soldiers it would be wise for the General Government to render them certain assistance.

"Very sincerely, yours,

"M. T. McMAHON.

"General T. S. PECK."

During the reading of the above report the following occurred:

Mr. MAISH. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this report be not insisted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. MAISH. It will simply have the effect of defeating the bill, for the bill will be withdrawn.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I simply wanted to know the facts. This is a new process of caring for the soldiers. It is quite a lengthy report, and I think the facts upon which it is made should be read.

Mr. MAISH. All of that could have been stated in five minutes; there is nothing new in it.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Why was the report so long, then?

Mr. MAISH. I did not write the report, or it would have been brief.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think that it ought to be read. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated that it interferes with the business of the House. I have no desire to do that, and on that account I withdraw the demand for the further reading; but it ought to be inserted in the RECORD. Let the gentleman make his statement, if it can be made in five minutes, and let us have the grounds upon which this action is sought.

Mr. LAIRD. This report, if it had the attention of the House, will be seen to demonstrate from the figures presented by the Board of Managers of Soldiers' Homes that there were two million seven hundred and odd thousand soldiers enrolled in the Army of the United States during the war. It appears that there are at least one million of them surviving. It states that forty-two thousand of these soldiers have been entertained at these homes established by law. There are five, and the one at Los Angeles makes the sixth, but it is not yet completed. It shows the average of these soldiers to be about ten thousand who are received and cared for at these five homes.

The report of the managers demonstrates that either we must build additional homes, we must enlarge the capacity of those in existence, or we must grant aid to the States and encourage them in caring for these veterans, or refuse to do anything, and let these men take care of themselves to the end of life.

I have not been the champion of reckless legislation in the committee, but have favored this bill as a means of escaping from the expenditure of vast sums of the public money for the erection of flats called soldiers' homes, the usefulness of which must diminish in a short time—about ten years—and leave upon the hands of the Government vast properties that either will be valueless or lessened in value, when the necessity for caring for the soldiers in them is diminished.

The recommendation of the Board of Managers is clear, distinct, and practical. They ask us to give them as much money to add to the capacity of the present soldiers' homes, or to pass this law and encourage the States to care for their own men. And from the statements of the officers and governors of the States it appears that there had been expended in all the States for the caring of soldiers, which, I submit, belongs to the Government of the United States, as a matter of public spirit and patriotism, the extraordinary sum of $40,000,000. The great State of Massachusetts leads with an expenditure, creditably in her favor, of $18,000,000. The State of Wisconsin follows with an expenditure of $11,000,000; and so on until the vast sum of $40,000,000 has been expended for the caring of these men by the States.

So, then, the proposition comes down to this, and is fairly presented to the House, as to whether we shall pursue a policy which will encourage the States to care for these soldiers or expend this sum in enlarging the present capacity of the soldiers' homes now in existence, or refuse to do anything.

Mr. MATSON. Does the bill apply only to homes now established?

Mr. LAIRD. It applies to those established now and those to be established hereafter.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] whether it will not cost the Government under this proposed plan about one-quarter of what it would cost to construct national soldiers' homes and maintain them?

Mr. LAIRD. I will answer that in this way. The original cost of the maintenance of a soldier at the soldiers' homes is upwards of $200 a year, so the Government here assumes but one-half of the responsibility it would have to assume if it proposes to continue to support the soldiers at the national homes.

Mr. ROGERS. Before the gentleman sits down there are one or two points that I would like some information about. Do I understand that soldiers who are disabled but who are drawing pensions from the Government are entitled also to the privileges of these homes?

Mr. LAIRD. If the pension is over $24, no. If it is under $24, then, under the rules of the Board of Managers, it is subject to distribution to the families of the men, if they have families; otherwise it is paid into the treasury of the home.

Mr. ROGERS. By the rules of the Board of Managers, the gentleman says.

Mr. LAIRD. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. Then, if the limit is fixed at $24 by the authority of the Board of Managers, what reason is there why they should not change it and extend it to $54 or $504, or any other figure?

Mr. LAIRD. It is the law that fixes the limit. The law provides that if a soldier receives a pension above that amount, $24, he can not go into a home.

Mr. ROGERS. I understood you to say a moment ago that it was fixed by authority of the Board of Managers.

Mr. LAIRD. No. The character of the disability and the class of men who shall receive the benefit of this aid are determined by the regulations of the Board of Managers.

Mr. ROGERS. I have my friend's construction of that, and now, if he will pardon me, I will read the provision of the bill:

> That all States which have established, or which shall hereafter establish, homes for disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States who served in the war of the rebellion, or in any previous war, who are disabled by age and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living.

Thus the disability may be the result of habitual drunkenness, it may be the case of some young man who was twenty-five or thirty years of age when the war closed, and who by a reckless life has become an inebriate or otherwise diseased or disabled, and such a man will have the benefit of the home under this bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is the language of the existing law in regard to admission to the National Homes.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman will pardon me a moment. I can not grind two axes at once. The bill proceeds:

> And by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living.

Your bill has no sort of limitation whatever. It would embrace within its terms a man who had become a complete wreck by reason of drunkenness or any other vice.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The language which the gentleman has read is the existing law.

Mr. MAISH. This bill does not propose to change the existing law. What the gentleman has read is the law as it now exists in relation to admission to national soldiers' homes for disabled soldiers, and this bill simply recites the law as it exists.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know what the committee think this bill proposes; I am looking at the bill.

Mr. MAISH. But what I am trying to impress upon the gentleman is that this bill does not propose to change the existing law which applies to national homes for disabled soldiers.

Mr. ROGERS. What does the gentleman mean by the "existing law?"

Mr. MAISH. I mean that the language which you have read is the existing law.

Mr. ROGERS. Do I understand that under the existing law a man who has become disabled and incapable of taking care of himself, by reason of his own recklessness, drunkenness, or other vice or crime, may be admitted to the home and cared for there?

Mr. MAISH. If that is the interpretation of the law, I say yes.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. You mean that that is the gentleman's interpretation.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, if that is the general law now, I do not see any necessity for enacting this bill.

Mr. MAISH. That is another of the gentleman's mistakes. We propose simply to admit into the State homes for disabled soldiers upon the same terms on which they are now admitted to the national homes and at the same time save the Government $100 a year in each case.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This is a measure of economy to the General Government.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, with me it is not a matter of economy; it is a matter of principle.

Mr. WARNER. If the gentleman from Arkansas will allow a suggestion, this law was amended in 1884, when Congress authorized the establishment of the soldiers' home at Leavenworth. What the gentleman has read is the general law, and if this bill simply read that the same class of soldiers with the same disabilities should be admitted into the homes which the States establish as are admitted into the national homes for disabled soldiers, the effect would be the same. The language of the existing law is simply copied in this bill.

Mr. LAIRD. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Arkansas to a provision which I think checks the danger that he seems to anticipate. I read, beginning in the twelfth line of the bill:

> The number of such persons for whose care any State shall receive the said payment under this act shall be ascertained by the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers under such regulations as it may prescribe.

Now, if any fault is to be found with the possible abuse of power by the board, that of course is not a thing for which the Committee on Military Affairs or the Congress of the United States is responsible.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not want to consume time, but I have just a word or two to say. There are many provisions in this bill which do not meet my approbation. In the first place, I dislike very much to see Congress enter into a co-partnership with the States. In my judgment we had better keep the lines between the States and the General Government well delineated. The second objection that I have to the bill is that we make a surrender of the money of the General Government to the States, without any such control of the management of these homes as will enable the General Government to see that the money is properly expended and the parties properly taken care of.

On the other hand, if a power of regulation and control on the part of the General Government be asserted, then you are doing a thing which the Constitution does not warrant; you are undertaking to control the institutions of a State. So that upon either horn of the dilemma this matter is to me seriously objectionable.

It is true I do not profess to know anything about the management of these homes, and I have had very little to do with matters connected with the military arm of the service. It is with much diffidence that I consume a moment upon a matter of this kind. But to my mind this bill is seriously objectionable from every aspect in which it can be viewed, and I can not vote for it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, let us have a vote.

Mr. GIFFORD. There are two or three formal amendments which I would like to offer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I want to say to my friend from Dakota [Mr. GIFFORD] that by submitting amendments now he is simply imperiling the bill, because according to the understanding among members of the committee this bill must be withdrawn unless it be acted upon very shortly.

Mr. GIFFORD. I only desire to insert the word "Territory."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that amendment?

Mr. GIFFORD. At the suggestion of gentlemen of the Military Committee, who think the bill may be imperiled by offering amendments, I withhold my amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], who, I believe, has control of this bill, to what seems to me to be a very awkward and inaccurate wording in the first section. The language is: "Provided such disabilities were not incurred in any war against the United States," or words substantially like those.

Now, the gentleman knows, and I know——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My colleague [Mr. ADAMS] will allow me to make a suggestion. There is an understanding on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs that any bill, the consideration of which shall occupy more than fifteen minutes, shall be withdrawn. This bill has now occupied half an hour, and if the time is to be consumed by continued argument or inquiry I shall feel it incumbent upon me, in the interest of many other bills which I think will meet with no serious opposition, to withdraw the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I do not propose to make any argument. If my colleague had waited patiently for a moment he would have found——

Mr. LAIRD. I appreciate the point of the gentleman. My answer is that under our instructions we have made this bill in accordance with the Senate bill.

Mr. ADAMS. Well, it is inaccurately drawn.

Mr. MACDONALD. Then, it ought not to be passed.

Mr. LAIRD. It is not so inaccurate as to be objectionable.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. Under the bill in its present form the State of Massachusetts, which has expended, in caring for its soldiers, something like $18,000,000, may not be comprehended. I therefore move to amend by inserting, in line 4, after the word "establish," the words "or which support wholly or in part."

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from Nebraska whether this bill in its terms applies to the Territories?

Mr. GIFFORD. That is the amendment I desired to offer.

Mr. LAIRD. That does not affect this amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the object of this amendment?

Mr. LAIRD. The object is this: It allows the State of Massachusetts to receive such benefit as it may be entitled to receive under the general provisions of this bill, but which without the amendment it might not receive or which it might be questionable whether it would receive. It does not enlarge the bill at all. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not understand yet the evil which the gentleman seeks to correct. What is the remedy desired?

Mr. LODGE. The State home of Massachusetts was established largely by private benevolence, in the first place, and afterwards chartered by the State, there being over $200,000 of private subscriptions to establish the home. It was established as a private home at first. The State gives to the home $20,000 a year, but the bill would exclude it because $200,000 were given by private subscriptions.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is that the object of the amendment?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is the object of the amendment.

Mr. LAIRD's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I move to insert, after the word "States" wherever it occurs, the words "or Territories."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I move, after line 4, to insert "and orphans of soldiers and sailors."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on laying the bill aside with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes 13.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum has voted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The point of no quorum practically destroys the session for this evening, and if it is insisted upon I must withdraw the bill and take up some other business.

Mr. DORSEY. The gentleman from Texas agrees to let the committee rise, when he will ask for a vote in a full House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his point of no quorum?

Mr. KILGORE. I do, with the understanding that the bill shall go over to be voted on in a full House.

Mr. LAIRD. Let the bill be reported to the House.

Mr. KILGORE. I do not object to that.

So the motion to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 7939) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States, their widows and orphans, will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the special order, and had directed him to report back with amendments the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States; and also the bill (H. R. 7939) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States, their widows and orphans, with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

ALFRED PLEASONTON.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will yield now to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER. I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a brigadier-general, with the rank and grade of colonel, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment. I propose to move to non-concur in the amendment of the Senate and agree to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out all after the word "States," down to and including the word "State," in line 6, and insert "major." Page 1, line 8, strike out "colonel" and insert "major;" also amend the title.

Mr. HOOKER. This bill which comes from the Senate with an amendment is precisely the same sort of a bill the House has passed in reference to General P. F. Smith. Both were generals in the Army at the close of the war. General Pleasonton served forty-four years and was retired as major-general of volunteers precisely as in the case just passed.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have examined the case which has passed, and I find when he resigned he was only a major.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McMILLIN. That is in the report.

Mr. HOOKER. I refer to the case of General Pleasonton. I concede he was a major at the time he entered into the Army, but was retired as a major-general at the close of the war. He served from his graduation at West Point up to the conclusion of the war.

When the bill left the House it proposed to retire him as a colonel. It came back from the Senate with an amendment to retire him as a major.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. What was his rank at the time he retired from the Army?

Mr. HOOKER. He was a colonel at the time he retired, but he was a major-general in the volunteers.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I understand the Military Committee of the Senate have a rule which governs them in these matters, and that is the reason it has changed it from colonel to major.

Mr. HOOKER. Precisely; and exactly the same might apply to the other case which has just been acted upon.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. That may be——

Mr. HOOKER. And I insist, as the House passed a bill retiring him with the rank of colonel for his long service, that whatever may be the rule of the Senate in regard to these matters, as suggested by the gentleman, I hope the House will insist upon its own action and nonconcur. The Senate has appointed a committee of conference, and asked a conference with the House. This shows that it is an open question to be considered between the two Houses. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. If the Senate has passed upon the matter and the statement is correct that this gentleman only held the rank of major at the time of retiring, it seems to me that is as high a rank as he should hold under this bill.

Mr. HOOKER. Well, let it be settled in the conference.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Why not settle it right here?

Mr. KEAN. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion takes precedence.

Mr. HOOKER. The Senate asks a conference with the House upon the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. But that will be done away with if the House concurs in the Senate amendment; and I see no reason why he should not be retired simply as a major.

Mr HOOKER. This is not an isolated case. We have retired many other officers upon a higher rank than they had at the time of leaving the Army. We have retired them on the rank they held in the volunteer service.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Well, if we have done wrong before I hope we will not repeat it now.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. As I understand it, this will grant some measure of relief in conference.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey has already submitted that motion.

Mr. HOOKER. I hope the House will vote the proposition down.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. I hope the House will not. There is no reason why he should be retired at a higher grade than he held in the regular Army.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. KEAN to concur in the Senate amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 49.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. HOOKER. I now renew my motion to non-concur in the Senate amendment and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOOKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AID TO STATE HOMES FOR SUPPORT OF DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. LAIRD. Let me first dispose of the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States, reported from the Committee of the Whole a few moments ago.

Mr. SPINOLA. Let that come up with the rest of the batch. I object to taking up any further time in its consideration now.

Mr. LAIRD. It will take but a few moments. Let it pass its third reading, and after the previous question is ordered upon its passage, let it go over to the full House on the objection made by the gentleman from Texas. I ask unanimous consent that that course be pursued.

Mr. KILGORE. I desire to reserve the right to amend this bill also.

Mr. LAIRD. Then I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be taken up, read the third time, and the previous question be ordered upon its passage, accompanied with the right of amendment, and then go over.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that when the bill passes to its engrossment and third reading, the right of amendment is cut off.

Mr. LAIRD. But I ask consent to have that right granted to the gentleman, notwithstanding the operation of the previous question. That will be reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska that this bill be now ordered to a third reading?

There was no objection.

The bill was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on the passage of the bill; and the gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the bill, and that it go over to be called up hereafter with the right of amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill H. R. 7939, of the same title with the bill just acted upon, will be laid upon the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

BONDS OF DISBURSING OFFICERS.

Mr. CUTCHEON. By direction of the committee I now call up the bill (H. R. 8873) in relation to bonds of disbursing officers and to monthly payments of the Army.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War may accept a personal bond, or the bond of an incorporated guaranty company, for the faithful discharge of the duties of any disbursing officer of the Army, and such bond shall be in lieu of former bonds of such officer in respect to liabilities accruing subsequent to date of approval of said bond.

SEC. 2. That the number of paymasters in the Army with the rank of major shall be fixed at forty, and the Army shall hereafter be paid monthly, whenever the Secretary of War shall in his discretion so direct.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The report in this case is quite lengthy, covering four closely-printed pages; but I think I can make a statement of one minute that will cover the entire case.

Mr. ABBOTT. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. CUTCHEON. This is urgently recommended by the Secretary of War and the Paymaster-General in their last annual reports, and specially recommended in letters shown in the report. It will take fifteen minutes to read the report, at least.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman from Texas will allow a statement to be made in place of the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas has demanded the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. CUTCHEON) was read, as follows:

The bill in question has been submitted to the Secretary of War, and the responses of the Secretary and the Paymaster-General are herewith submitted.

Section 1 provides for the substitution of a bond of an incorporated guaranty company for the personal bond of such officer, and that the said bond shall be in lieu of former bonds.

At present all bonds are cumulative, and no matter how many bonds may be subsequently given the original bondsmen are still held.

This seems to be an unnecessary hardship on disbursing officers. The Government can fully protect itself by having a full settlement with the officer on accepting a new bond.

The present system makes it almost impossible for an Army disbursing officer to procure bonds.

The second section fixes the number of paymasters in the Army at forty, which was the number at the beginning of this year. On March 9, one paymaster was retired, leaving thirty-nine in service.

Attention is directed to the report of the Paymaster-General.

By the act of July 5, 1884, it was provided that the number of paymasters with the rank of major should be limited to twenty-nine, and that no vacancies should be filled until the number is reduced to twenty-eight.

The Paymaster-General says: "This Department is crippled by the reduction of its force." He concludes by saying, "I earnestly recommend the passage of the bill."

The provision in regard to monthly payments is not mandatory, but permissory only; and, in fact, is no more than a legislative approval of a power already conferred upon the Secretary of War.

In this connection the following extracts from the annual report of the Paymaster-General are appended:

"As there seemed to be a constant and pressing demand from the enlisted men of the Army for more frequent payments, and it was urged by many officers that payments to the troops at short intervals would tend to check desertion and improve the morale of the Army, I addressed a letter to the Adjutant-General of the Army, requesting that the necessary orders directing that the troops at the twenty-nine following-named posts be mustered for pay on July 31, 1887, and monthly thereafter:

"List of posts to be paid monthly.

"1. Fort Wood, New York Harbor.
"2. Fort Columbus, New York Harbor.
"3. Fort Wadsworth, New York Harbor.
"4. Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor.
"5. Fort Schuyler, New York Harbor.
"6. David's Island, New York Harbor.
"7. Willet's Point, New York Harbor.
"8. Sandy Hook, New Jersey.
"9. Fort Warren, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts.
"10. Fort Niagara, New York.
"11. Fort Porter, New York.
"12. Fort Wayne, Michigan.
"13. Newport Barracks, Kentucky.
"14. Washington Barracks, District of Columbia.
"15. Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.
"16. Leavenworth Military Prison.
"17. Jefferson Barracks, Missouri.
"18. Fort Omaha, Nebraska.
"19. Salt Lake City Barracks, Utah.
"20. Fort Douglas, Utah.
"21. Fort Snelling, Minnesota.
"22. Post of San Antonio, Texas.
"23. Fort Bliss, Texas.
"24. San Diego Barracks, California.
"25. Fort Lowell, Arizona.
"26. Fort Mason, California.
"27. Presidio of San Francisco, California.
"28. Vancouver Barracks, Washington Territory.
"29. Fort Walla Walla, Washington Territory.

"To this list at subsequent dates were added the following six posts:

"30. Fort Myer, Virginia;
"31. Watertown Arsenal, Massachusetts;
"32. Angel Island, California;
"33. Alcatraz Island, California;
"34. Fort McHenry, Maryland;
"35. Fortress Monroe, Virginia;

"and the various recruiting rendezvous.

"The posts selected were those in the vicinity of the stations of paymasters, and were so chosen because the additional payments could be made without any additional cost to the Government except a slight outlay in a few instances where a small amount of travel expenses would be incurred.

"Since the system has been inaugurated I have had numerous requests to extend it to the more isolated posts, where it was claimed that the advantages to be derived from it would be more sensibly felt, but I was forced to deny them, as with my present available force of officers it would be impossible to pay all the posts so situated owing to time necessarily consumed in traveling to and from them.

"If it is deemed to be in the interests of the service that the system of monthly payments be extended to the entire Army, I would recommend that the act of July 5, 1884, be so amended as to limit the number of paymasters to forty, the number now in the Department. I would further recommend that the proviso of said act be amended so as to read: 'That hereafter any paymaster of the rank of major who has served twenty years in the United States Army as a commissioned officer shall, upon his own application, or by direction of the President, be placed upon the retired-list of the Army.'

"I would again invite attention to a recommendation in a former report in the matter of paymasters' bonds. It is held by the accounting officers of the Treasury that each bond given by a paymaster is a continuing bond from the date of its approval so long as the officer is in service under his current commission, notwithstanding a new bond is required from him every four years or oftener if the interests of the service demand it. Under such a ruling paymasters experience great difficulty in obtaining sureties.

"While a person may be willing to assume a responsibility which will extend through a limited period, he will hesitate to assume one to which no limit is fixed, and from which he can obtain no release. The legislation which has been enacted to remedy this evil in the matter of bonds of collectors of internal revenue (20 Statutes, page 327) and of postmasters (Revised Statutes, 3827) should be extended to the bonds of paymasters. I would further recommend, as a matter of relief to paymasters, that the bond of an approved guaranty company be accepted as security.

"The bonds of such companies are accepted by very many of our leading railroad and express companies, banking and insurance institutions, for the faithful discharge of the financial trust of their employés. If this facility to bond were extended to paymasters, the Department could then with propriety ask the enactment of the legislation necessary to require the paymaster to rebond within a specified date, or in the event of his failure to do so to declare his commission vacated. As the law now stands, the Department has no option in case an officer declines to bond beyond placing him on waiting orders with full pay."

The following extracts from the annual report of the Secretary of War are also appended:

"[Extracts from the annual report of the Secretary of War, 1887.]

"On the subject of paymasters's bonds, I quote the remarks of the Paymaster-General, with the recommendation that the change be extended to all officers of the Department and the Army who are required to give bond.

"It is held by the accounting officers of the Treasury that each bond given by a paymaster is a continuing bond from the date of its approval so long as the officer is in service under his current commission, notwithstanding a new bond is required from him every four years, or oftener, if the interests of the service demand.

"Under such a ruling paymasters experience great difficulty in obtaining securities. While a person may be willing to assume a responsibility which will extend through a limited period, he will hesitate to assume one to which no limit is fixed, and from which he can obtain no release. The legislation which has been enacted to remedy this evil in the matter of bonds of collectors of internal revenue (20 Stats., page 327) and of postmasters (Rev. Stat., sec. 3827) should be extended to the bonds of paymasters. As a matter of relief to paymasters, I would further recommend that the bond of an approved guaranty company be accepted as security."

"For many years it has been the custom to pay the Army on the bi-monthly muster. Numerous requests have been made for more frequent payments, and in order to comply as far as practicable with this expressed desire, monthly payments were made at thirty-five posts in the vicinity of the stations of paymasters, and there appears to be a general wish that this system be extended to the more isolated posts. The service of forty paymasters will be required to carry out this recommendation."

In view of the recommendations of the Paymaster-General and the approval thereof by the Secretary of War, and believing that the relief provided by the bill is just and sound in policy, the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The communications with the War Department are attached as a part hereof.

WAR DEPARTMENT, PAYMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 16, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the letter of Hon. B. M. CUTCHEON, of the 12th instant, inclosing a copy of a proposed bill providing for monthly payments to the Army and fixing the number of paymasters at forty, referred to this office, with the following remarks:

The number of paymasters in service January 1, 1888, was forty. On the 9th instant, by retirement of one, this number was reduced to thirty-nine.

The act of July 5, 1884, limits the number to twenty-nine majors, and provides that no vacancies can be filled until that number is reduced to twenty-eight.

The effect of section 2 of the proposed bill will be to stop further depletion in the number, and permit the appointment, when vacancies occur, of such numbers as will be required to maintain the number of majors at forty.

This Department is crippled by the reduction of its force. It is not possible, with the number reduced, to pay the Army promptly each month and to supply the other demands upon it.

The available force is now actively employed on disbursing duty. While all other bureaus of the War Department have from one to four officers on bureau duty in this city the pay department has none.

The only available officer who could, without injury to the service, be taken from the duty paying troops is now overburdened with his disbursing duties in paying claims for back pay and bounty under the recent deficiency bills.

There are now over 12,000 of these claims, recently received from the auditor, who has notified the claimants that the pay department is now ready to pay them. All these claimants expect immediate remittance.

It is not within the range of possibilities for the single officer available for this duty to pay these claims until late in the coming summer.

I earnestly recommend the passage of the bill, as the efficiency of the Department can not be maintained if the act of July 5, 1884, continues in force.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. B. ROCHESTER,
Paymaster-General, United States Army.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Official copy.

WM. B. ROCHESTER,

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, May 2, 1888.

SIR: In reply to your request of the 24th ultimo for the views of this Department upon House bill 8873, Fiftieth Congress, first session, "in relation to bonds of disbursing officers and to monthly payments of the Army," I have the honor to invite attention to the inclosed report of the 30th ultimo, on the subject, with its accompanying papers, from the Paymaster-General, expressing the opinion that the provision for accepting from disbursing officers personal bonds, or the bonds of incorporated guaranty companies, would afford a much needed relief to those officers, which view is concurred in by this Department.

In regard to fixing the number of paymasters, as provided by section 2 of the bill, I inclose a copy of Department letter of the 23d of March last to Hon. B. M. CUTCHEON, expressing the views of the Department on the subject.

It may be added that legislation to effect monthly payments of the Army is unnecessary, as it is in the power of the Secretary of War to direct such payments, as has been done in many cases.

Very respectfully,

S. V. BENÉT,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Ordnance, and Acting Secretary of War.

Hon. R. W. TOWNSHEND,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, PAYMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, April 30, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith H. R. 8873, a bill in relation to bonds of disbursing officers; fixing the number of paymasters in the Army at forty, and paying the Army monthly, referred to me for report.

I am of opinion that the legislation asked in relation to the bonds of disbursing officers will afford a much-needed relief to the disbursing officers of this Department. I have in repeated reports urged that the attention of Congress should be called to this subject, and would invite attention to my remarks thereon in my last annual report (page 5), and to your recommendation that the benefits be extended to all disbursing officers of the War Department and the Army in your report for 1887, page 23.

In the matter of monthly payments to the Army, I inclose a copy of my letter in reply to the letter of Hon. M. B. CUTCHEON on this subject, and to pages 2 and 3 of my last report.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. B. ROCHESTER,
Paymaster-General, United States Army.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 23, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the proposed bill providing for monthly payments to the Army, and fixing the number of paymasters at forty, sent me on March 12 for information with regard to the second section.

The report of the Paymaster-General, which accompanies this, will, it is believed, explain this section fully.

As in the course of the reduction called for by the act of July 5, 1884, the Pay Department has only recently been reduced below the number at which it is proposed by this bill to fix it, longer experience will be wanted before report can be made as to whether the extreme limit of reduction consistent with efficiency has been reached.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. B. M. CUTCHEON,
House of Representatives.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to ask the gentleman how many paymasters we have now in the Army?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Thirty-nine.

Mr. CUTCHEON. There were forty, but there are now thirty-nine.

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McMILLIN. If I may be indulged one moment, I would like to state that I remember when I first came to Congress, about nine years ago, there was an effort to reduce the number of these paymasters. It was attempted by many, and claimed by a portion at least, and I am not sure but the majority, of the Committee on Military Affairs that forty were not needed. We struggled and struggled along and never could repeal the law; they had too much influence to permit that to be done. Finally we did repeal it, and there was a provision made that when, on account of accidents, deaths, or retirements, there were any vacancies occurring, they should not be filled until it reached the limit of twenty-eight. Now, this bill proposes to break that limit and to put it back to forty. I suppose the object is not on the part of the committee, but on the part of others, and that the War Department may want to fill vacancies. There is a vacancy there, and if this limit can be removed any vacancies will be filled.

The gentleman from Missouri will remember the struggle we had to get that limit cut down, and it could not be claimed by any military man in the United States that it will take forty men to pay twenty-odd thousand soldiers.

Mr. ROGERS rose.

Mr. CUTCHEON. As I called up the bill and have made no statement concerning it, perhaps the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] will permit me to make a statement.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman to make a statement.

Mr. CUTCHEON. This bill attempts to do two things: First, to relieve paymasters of the Army in respect to their bonds. At the present time paymasters' bonds are cumulative. He may be required to give an addition as often as the Department may call upon him.

Under the present system he gives bonds when he enters upon the service, and a few years afterwards he gives another bond, and then a few years later another, but all the time the first bond remains in force, even to the end of his period of service, and there is no possibility of being relieved of it. By reason of this it has become very difficult indeed for paymasters and other disbursing officers of the Army to secure bonds. The first feature of the bill is that it allows a paymaster, instead of giving a personal or individual bond, to give the bond of an indemnity corporation.

That is recommended by the Paymaster-General and assented to by the Secretary of War. The second feature of the bill is in respect to monthly payments instead of bimonthly payments. Heretofore for a long period of time the Army has been paid bimonthly, once in sixty days. Within the past two or three years a movement has been inaugurated in favor of monthly payments, and the Secretary of War has tried that plan with great satisfaction to the Army and to all concerned.

Last year, as will be seen by the statement of the Department, such payments were made at thirty-five posts, and it is now proposed to extend the system of monthly payments to all the posts; in other words, to double the amount of work heretofore done by the paymasters of the Army. That is the second feature of the bill, and it is desired by the Army, by the Paymaster-General, and by all concerned. Following that, the third feature is to retain the number of paymasters at forty. At the time the act of 1884 spoken of by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] was passed, I think the number of paymasters in the service was fifty-two, and it was proposed by that bill that no vacancies should be filled until the whole number had been reduced to twenty-nine.

Mr. MACDONALD. What is the present number of the Army?

Mr. CUTCHEON. The present number is limited to twenty-five thousand men—forty regiments besides the posts.

Mr. SPINOLA. There are eighteen thousand on the rolls.

Mr. CUTCHEON. The Army is scattered, of course, over a vast extent of territory. I was about to say that at the beginning of this year the number of paymasters was forty. Since the beginning of the year, and before this report was prepared, one had been retired, leaving the number thirty-nine. The Paymaster-General in his response to the committee says:

It is not within the range of possibility for the single officer available for this duty to pay these claims until late in the coming summer. I earnestly recommend the passage of the bill, as the efficiency of the Department can not be maintained if the act of July 5, 1884, continues in force.

Mr. ROGERS. What is that act?

Mr. CUTCHEON. The one that forbade filling of vacancies until the total number of paymasters should have been reduced to twenty-nine.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to ask one question for information, because, as I said before, I am not very familiar with the military arm of the Government. Are these paymasters officers in the Army?

Mr. CUTCHEON. They are majors in the Army.

Mr. ROGERS. And their salaries are increased by reason of their acting as paymasters?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I think not. They have the rank of major.

Mr. ROGERS. But their pay is increased, is it not, by reason of their acting as paymasters?

Mr. MAISH. No; they are appointed from civil life.

Mr. McMILLIN. But they are put on the retired-list.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am satisfied this bill will not pass to-night; and I therefore ask my friend from Michigan not to insist upon its present consideration.

Mr. ROGERS. With two amendments, I should not object to the bill.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I think that to a part of the bill there will be no objection whatever—the feature in regard to the bond, and the enactment of that will be a great relief.

Mr. ROGERS. Let us go on with the bill for a moment. Would not the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] accept an amendment inserting, after the word "company," in section 1, the words "or both," so as to allow the Department to take the bond of an indemnity company or an individual bond, or both?

Mr. CUTCHEON. I will accept that. It will then be in the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I propose to amend section 2 so as to make it read: "That the Army shall hereafter be paid monthly whenever the Secretary of War, in his discretion, shall so direct."

Mr. CUTCHEON. I would rather accept that than not have any legislation on this subject.

Mr. SPINOLA. Does this bill propose to increase the number of paymasters?

Mr. ROGERS. It makes an increase of one, as I understand it.

Mr. SPINOLA. I am opposed to it if it increases the number a single one.

Mr. CUTCHEON. With the amendment it would not affect the number at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 1, after the word "company," insert the words "or both."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in section 2, the words "the number of paymasters in the Army with the rank of paymaster shall be fixed at forty and;" so as to make it read: "That the Army shall be paid hereafter monthly whenever the Secretary of War in his discretion shall so direct."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I move to amend by inserting after the word "disbursing," in line 5, of section 1, the words "or other." Other officers than disbursing officers are required, as I understand, to give bonds. Let them have the same privilege of giving a personal bond, or the bond of a guaranty company.

The amendment of Mr. BAKER, of New York, was agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD. I wish to inquire what is the necessity of authorizing the Secretary of War to accept a personal bond, or the bond of an incorporated guaranty company? Does that change the existing law? Can he not do so now?

Mr. CUTCHEON. This provision is in the alternative; the Secretary of War may accept either or may require both.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CUTCHEON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I move to amend the title of the bill by inserting, after the word "disbursing," the words "or other."

The amendment was agreed to.

GENERAL WILLIAM F. SMITH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now ask that final action be taken on the bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "major-general" and insert "colonel."

Strike out the last three lines of the bill, as follows:

"But this proviso shall be no bar to claims for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of said William F. Smith may have after his decease."

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. KILGORE. I call for the reading of the engrossed copy of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman will not stop our proceedings by making such a demand. He knows very well that the bill is not engrossed, and can not be engrossed to-night.

Mr. KILGORE. I think a bill of this importance ought to be considered by the House when a quorum is present.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the gentleman raises the question of a quorum, we may as well know it now. I did not suppose the gentleman would stop our proceedings in this way.

Mr. KILGORE. I am willing to let the bill go over to be voted on when a quorum is present.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If the previous question may be recognized as ordered on the passage of the bill, I am willing that the vote be taken to-morrow morning in the House.

Mr. KILGORE. Reserving the right to present amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. With the understanding that the previous question is ordered on the passage of the bill, if the gentleman wants to offer an amendment in the House, I will even consent to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] state the proposition?

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from Illinois can state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As I understand, the gentleman is willing that the previous question be considered as ordered upon the passage of the bill, provided he may have the right to offer an amendment, and that the vote be taken in the House to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands, the demand for the reading of the engrossed bill is withdrawn.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir.

The bill was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On that question it was the understanding that the previous question be ordered——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question——

Mr. KILGORE. Reserving the right to amend.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And that the previous question be considered as ordered upon such amendment as may be offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

GENERAL ALFRED PLEASONTON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. HOOKER, Mr. TOWNSHEND, and Mr. GEAR as conferees on the part of the House upon the bill (H. R. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton a brigadier-general.

WILLIAM W. AVERELL.

Mr. MAISH. I move that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1650) for the relief of Maj. Gen. W. W. Averell, and that the House now consider the same as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on discharging the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. Let us hear the bill read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, before and during the late war, and of severe wounds received by him in battle, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William W. Averell, brevet major-general United States Army and late brigadier-general United States Volunteers, to the position of captain in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired list of the Army as of that grade, the retired list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said William W. Averell, nor shall any compensation be paid to him for any period prior to his appointment under this act; but this proviso shall be no bar to any claims for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of the said William W. Averell may have after his decease.

Mr. MACDONALD. I desire to say something upon this question.

Mr. MAISH. I do not surrender the floor.

Mr. MACDONALD. I will make my remarks very brief.

Mr. MAISH. Before the gentleman proceeds, I desire to explain briefly that the bill on this subject reported by the House committee proposed to retire General Averell with the rank of colonel. This Senate bill proposes to retire him with the rank of captain. We are satisfied to allow the Senate bill to pass, retiring General Averell with the rank of captain, the rank which he had when he entered the volunteer service and the rank which he held in the regular Army.

Mr. MACDONALD. I wish to say a word in explanation of my position here. In the early part of the session I introduced a bill in the nature of a general law providing for placing distinguished officers on the retired-list. That bill has not been reported to the House. Neither has the bill of a general nature introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA]. In the mean time several bills have been introduced here in favor of particular officers and passed. I give notice that I shall insist hereafter that there shall be a general law covering all these cases, so that there can be no partiality shown to any particular officer.

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Chairman, this case has merits not possessed by others. General Averell retired from the Army in 1865 from wounds received in battle. At the time he resigned there was no retired-list in the Army. In less than one year and three months afterwards a law was passed providing for placing distinguished officers, as General Averell when he resigned, on the retired-list.

In my judgment General Averell has a right to ask to be retired. He resigned from wounds received in the service of his country. He asks to be put in the same position he would have been in if he had postponed his resignation for one year and three months longer.

There is a principle in this case which does not exist in the other bills which have been passed to-night. The case of General Averell presents merits not possessed by other cases, and I hope he will be accorded the same consideration at least which has been granted to the cases of other officers to-night. I am willing that this case shall be put upon the same footing with the other cases and that it shall go over if necessary. I think it is unjust, however, not to allow this to go through when the other bills were permitted to pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the bill indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise for the purpose of offering the same amendment to this bill which I have offered to the other. I do not think it would be well to vary from the custom of not allowing pensions to widows of officers on the retired-list.

Mr. MAISH. Let the gentleman indicate his amendment.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move to strike out the words which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words:

"But this proviso shall be no bar to any claim for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of the said William W. Averell may have after his decease."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the bill as amended to a third reading.

Mr. MACDONALD. Is it proposed to press this bill to-night notwithstanding what I have said?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MACDONALD. I give notice, then, that I shall call for a quorum.

Mr. MAISH. As a matter of course if the gentleman persists in treating this bill differently from other bills he can do so; but it seems to me it should have as much consideration as bills in the other cases which have not as great merits as is possessed by the case of General Averell.

Mr. MACDONALD. I supposed when I heard the case of General Pleasonton that that would be the only one which would be pending. The next case was that of General Smith. Now we have the case of General Averell. As soon as that has been gotten rid of I am appealed to in behalf of the case of General A. J. Smith. I must object to the whole Smith family getting in and the favorites of others, when my friends, having as gallant a record as any, are left out.

Mr. SPINOLA. Will the gentleman give way to me for a moment?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPINOLA. I will state for the information of the gentleman that the Committee on Military Affairs has authorized me to report a general bill. It is now being prepared and will be submitted to the House in a few days. I will advise my friend from Minnesota when it will be ready.

Mr. MACDONALD. By that time all of these favorites of gentlemen here will be through.

Mr. SPINOLA. Oh! bless your soul, no; not a quarter of them.

Mr. MACDONALD. This bill has been pending for two months.

Mr. SPINOLA. Well, let poor old Averell get through this time. We will take care of the rest in the general bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. Well, I have stated my objections.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and on a division there were—ayes 50, noes, 5.

Mr. MACDONALD. No quorum.

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, let me ask if the gentleman objects to the same order being made in reference to this bill as in the others; that is, that the previous question be considered as ordered, and that the bill go over with the right to amend?

Mr. MACDONALD. I will let that go, but I give notice that I will object to all the rest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of no quorum?

Mr. MACDONALD. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the ayes have it, and the bill is ordered to a third reading.

The bill was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. MAISH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed——

Mr. MATSON. I understood that the previous question was to be considered as ordered, but that the vote on the passage of the bill was not to be taken to-night.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the understanding.

Mr. WEAVER. The previous question to be ordered and the vote to be taken to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the gentleman must move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. MAISH. If my friend insists——

Mr. MACDONALD. I did not agree that this bill might be voted on, and did not suppose that that action was being taken.

Mr. MAISH. Then I will ask that the other order be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the vote by which this bill was passed will be reconsidered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MAISH. Now, I ask unanimous consent that the same order be made with reference to this bill, that is to say, that the previous question be considered as ordered on the final passage of the bill with the right to amend.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is understood that the previous question is to be ordered upon the bill and upon such amendments as may be offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. The agreement was that amendments might be offered by any gentleman, not alone by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that to have been the order made. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill H. R. 5239 of the same title will be laid on the table.

ANDREW J. SMITH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers; and that the same be considered in the House.

Mr. MACDONALD. I object to that.

Mr. GEAR. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. GEAR. I now ask that the bill which I have called up may be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the laws regulating appointments in the Army be, and they are hereby, suspended, and suspended only for the purposes of this act; and the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, a brigadier-general in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him, the said Andrew J. Smith, upon the retired-list of the Army as such brigadier-general without regard and in addition to the number now authorized by law of said retired-list.

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. GEAR) was read, as follows:

Andrew J. Smith as a soldier is well known to the entire country. Nothing that can be said in this report can add to his distinguished name. He is now over seventy-three years of age. His military service is given in the following communication from the Adjutant-General, United States Army:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, February 8, 1886.

"Statement of the military service of Andrew J. Smith, late of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office.

"He was graduated at the United States Military Academy at the age of twenty-three years and two months, and was appointed second lieutenant First Dragoons July 1, 1838; was promoted first lieutenant March 4, 1845; captain, February 16, 1847; major, May 13, 1861, and lieutenant-colonel Fifth Cavalry May 9, 1864; appointed colonel Seventh Cavalry July 28, 1866.

"He was mustered in as colonel Second California Cavalry October 2, 1861, and resigned November 13, 1861.

"He was appointed brigadier-general United States Volunteers March 17, 1862, and major-general United States Volunteers May 12, 1864.

"He received the brevet of colonel United States Army April 10, 1864, 'for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Pleasant Hill, La.;' of brigadier-general United States Army March 13, 1865, 'for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Tupelo, Miss.;' and of major-general United States Army March 13, 1865, 'for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Nashville, Tenn.'

"He served with his regiment on the Western frontier and Pacific coast, excepting short intervals of detached duty and leaves of absence, from 1838 to 1861; with the Second California Cavalry October 2, 1861, to November 13, 1861, when he resigned and was ordered to report to the Adjutant-General United States Army, under his commission as major Fifth United States Cavalry.

"He served as chief of cavalry, Department of the Missouri, from February 11 to March 11, 1862, and of the Department of the Mississippi to July 11, 1862, being engaged in the advance upon and siege of Corinth, April 15 to May 30, 1862; commanding troops at Covington, Ky., and vicinity, September 9 to October 9, 1862; commanding Tenth Division, Thirteenth Army Corps, in movements through Kentucky, October to November, 1862; at Memphis, Tenn., November 28 to December 21, 1862; on expedition with General Grant's army to the Yazoo River, Mississippi, December, 1862, being engaged in the assault of Chickasaw Bluffs, December 27-29, 1862, and on the expedition to Arkansas Post, to January 11, 1863; in the Vicksburg campaign and operations against Jackson, Miss., to August 5, 1863; commanding the Sixth Division, Sixteenth Army Corps, and District of Columbus, Kentucky, to January 21, 1864, and Third Division, Sixteenth Army Corps, to March 6, 1864; commanding detachments (two divisions), Sixteenth and Seventeenth Army Corps, in the Red River campaign, to May 22, 1864; commanding right wing Sixteenth Army Corps, in Mississippi and Tennessee, to September, 1864, and in pursuit of the rebel General Price, in Missouri, to November, 1864; commanding detachment of the Army of the Tennessee to February, 1865, participating in the operations about Nashville Tenn., under Major-General Thomas; commanding Sixteenth Army Corps (in the Mobile campaign and siege of Spansh Fort, Alabama), to August 8, 1865, District of Montgomery, Ala., to October 25, 1865, and District of Western Louisiana until honorably mustered out of the volunteer service, January 15, 1866; on leave of absence and permission to delay joining his command (Seventh United States Cavalry), to November 26, 1866; commanding regiment and District of Upper Arkansas, at Forts Riley and Harker, Kansas, to September 14, 1887; commanding Department of the Missouri to March 2, 1868; on leave to May 6, 1869, whenhe resigned.

"R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General."

It will be seen that at the date of his resignation (May 6, 1869) he had served thirty years and ten months.

On the 15th of July, 1870, the law was amended, providing that—

"Where an officer has been thirty years in the service, he may, upon his own application, in the discretion of the President, be so retired and placed on the retired-list." (Sec. 1243.)

Had General Smith remained in the Army until the passage of that law he would have served over thirty-two years and could have been placed upon the retired-list on his own application.

At the time of his resignation an act of Congress reduced the Army from 45 colonels and 45 lieutenant-colonels to 25 colonels and 25 lieutenant-colonels.

"It was the most ungrateful task imposed upon us by Congress," writes General W. T. Sherman. Then it was that General A. J. Smith, with a soldier's generosity, to make way for younger men, resigned as colonel of the Seventh Cavalry.

The following letter from General W. T. Sherman needs no explanation:

"ST. LOUIS, MO., March 3, 1886.

"DEAR WARNER: Having been requested to bear testimony as to the value of the services rendered to the Government by General Andrew J. Smith, now a citizen of St. Louis, I beg to state that I have had special opportunities to observe his conduct during the past fifty years.

"He was a cadet at West Point when I went there in 1836. He graduated in 1838 and went to the frontier, where he served till the Mexican war, 1846, when he came out to California with Cooke's battalion, and continued there and in Oregon up to the civil war, which he was quick to enter; and came to us at Shiloh in April, 1862, as a brigadier-general of volunteers, and marched with us to Corinth, from which time to the end of the war he was one of the pluckiest and best fighters of our western army.

"For details I refer to Cullum's Register (volume 1, pages 566 and 567). Not a soldier of the western army but remembers "Old A. J." He was with me at Chickasaw and Vicksburg on my Meridian march, and after was sent by me in command of the two divisions detached to General Banks up Red River. His conduct there is described as peculiarly brilliant. After coming out of Red River he was sent to Tupelo, Miss., where he fairly defeated Forrest, and then was called to Missouri to drive Price out of the State, immediately after which he hastened to Nashville, where he gave material help to General Thomas in the great victory of Nashvill. Without rest he was sent to Mobile, which he assisted to capture, and at the end of the war was found at Montgomery, Ala. His service in the civil war was simply invaluable and can not be measured by dollars and cents.

"As soon as the war was over he returned to his rank in the regular Army as colonel of the Seventh Cavalry, on the plains, fighting the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and Kiowas to clear the way for the Kansas Pacific Railroad.

"I do not remember that General Smith ever lost a day in the field from sickness; and in California, in Oregon, on the plains, and throughout the civil war he had the reputation of being the hardest worker and hardest fighter in the army.

"I believe a million of men would sign a petition that this now old, but most honest, faithful, uncomplaining soldier and gentleman should be restored to his old place on the Army Register, and retired with any rank Congress may think appropriate. He was a corp commander, which the world over is that of lieutenant-general, but I am told he will be satisfied with that of brigadier-general. I surely recommend it.

"Yours, very truly,

"W. T. SHERMAN, General.

"HON. WILLIAM WARNER,
"Member of Congress, of Missouri, Washington, D. C."

Your committee report the bill back, with the recommendation that the same do pass with the following amendment, namely:

To strike out in line 11 the words "as such brigadier-general," and insert the following words in lieu thereof: "With the rank and grade of colonel."

Mr. MATSON. I wish to know what the rank is.

Mr. GEAR. He had the rank of colonel of the Seventh Cavalry.

Mr. MATSON. But I mean the rank provided by this bill.

Mr. GEAR. The same rank that he had in the regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill as amended provides for that.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe a colonel gets $3,600 a year?

Mr. WARNER. No; $2,600.

Mr. CHEADLE. Twenty-six hundred and twenty-five.

Mr. McMILLIN. I believe that the rates of wages show that the average earning capacity of men in this country, taking the laboring people together, is about or not above $300. Some get more of course, but taking the farmers and laboring people generally, if I remember accurately, the census report places the average at about that figure. Has this House thought at that rate of the number of men, American citizens, that are to be set to work to keep one man in luxury? If not, it is very well for them to think of it now. There is no man in whose behalf I believe a legislator of the United States will be justified in assigning fifty or seventy-five other citizens of the United States to labor for his support, especially after he gets out of the Army and spends a good part of the active portion of his life in callings looking to his own financial and other advantages. I do not believe it is right.

Mr. GEAR. He spent the days of his youth in behalf of his country.

Mr. MACDONALD. I will not make the point of no quorum in reference to this or insist further upon the objections I have heretofore made. I do not wish to appear captious, because I favor bills of this kind in meritorious cases, but I hope that the bill will take the same course as the others acted upon recently.

Mr. WARNER. Certainly; I do not want the bill to have any advantage over the others, and I am willing for that.

Mr. ROGERS. I only wish to submit a single word. The record shows to-night that I am here, and I do not care to be captious and put obstacles in the way of measures. I have not voted for any one of these bills, believing it a bad principle, and I am going to vote against this and all others of a like character.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MONUMENT AT FORT GREENE, BROOKLYN.

Mr. SPINOLA. I have got in quite late, and I am going to ask the indulgence of the committee to call up the bill H. R. 1687. You have heard all about the rebellion and other wars, and now I propose to call the attention of the committee for a few minutes to the war of the Revolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the erection and completion of a monument to the memory of the victims of prison-ships, to be placed at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, State of New York: Provided, That the money appropriated as aforesaid shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and the plans, specifications, and design for such monument shall, before any of the money so appropriated is expended, be first approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not ask for the reading of the report, but I wish my distinguished and venerable friend would state the facts.

Mr. SPINOLA. I will state the facts, but will first offer an amendment to restore the amount in the bill to one hundred thousand dollars, the sum that was in the bill when it was first reported, instead of fifty thousand, as it is now; and then I have one or two other amendments that I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that this bill seems to have been considered April 3 in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and amended by striking out "one hundred thousand" and inserting "fifty thousand."

Mr. SPINOLA. I want to move to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will have to rise before that motion can be considered, as this bill is on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the committee do now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCCREARY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2579) and had directed him to report the same back with an amendment.

ANDREW J. SMITH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The question is now on the amendment.

Mr. MACDONALD. I understood that these bills were to go over until to-morrow.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that, by unanimous consent, the previous question be considered as ordered upon the bill and such amendments as may be offered, the right to amend to be reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] moves that the previous question be considered as ordered on this bill, and that the right to amend be reserved. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

MONUMENT AT FORT GREENE, BROOKLYN.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move that the House go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1687) for the erection and completion of a monument to the memory of the victims of the prison-ships at Fort Greene, Brooklyn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The bill is in the House, and I will ask the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. As one of the Representatives in this honorable body, I had the honor to present this bill. This is the only bill I have had the honor to present in the Fiftieth Congress, and it was done on solicitation, and on a resolution passed by the senate and assembly of the State of New York, signed by the governor, unanimously petitioning Congress in its favor. I also have the honor of stating that it was passed by the board of aldermen of the city of Brooklyn, a city containing nearly a million of population, and it was also passed by the board of supervisors of that city, and by the Association of old Brooklynites, numbering four or five hundred. I would state that no man can enter that society unless he has been a resident of Brooklyn for fifty years.

This petition was procured by going from house to house and being signed by the tax-payers and other citizens of King's County. The most of the old Brooklynites are tax-payers; and I presume out of the 17,000 tax-payers in the city of Brooklyn and the County of Kings it is fair to say that some 8,000 or 10,000 of those tax-payers have put their names to the petition that these gentlemen send here, numbering nearly 20,000. Now, I do not wish to occupy the time of the committee.

The bones of 11,500 men are lying there, and I think it is a standing disgrace to this great country that these 11,500 veterans during that memorable war should lie there without any monument to cover their bones.

The city has procured an elegant site on Fort Greene, that old place where the last battle on Long Island was fought under Washington, and where he made that celebrated retreat in the fog in the early morning. They have procured this place, and it is requested of this honorable body to make this appropriation in order that we may have a suitable monument to cover the place where these veterans lost their lives; and in a more inhuman way lives were never lost in this world.

I will not occupy the time of the House any further, as my colleague [Mr. SPINOLA] and other gentlemen want to be heard on this question, but I will ask leave to print with my remarks a letter from my colleague [Hon. S. S. COX] and a petition of the "Society of Old Brooklynites," on this subject. [Applause.]

The letter and petition are as follows:

1408 NEW HAMPSHIRE AVENUE, July 19, 1888.

MY BELOVED COLLEAGUE: RICHARD TOWNSHEND, Mr. FORD, and others of the Military Committee were anxious to-day that I should accede to your wish and come up to the House to-night to preside. Mr. Speaker CARLISLE indicated the same wish. One inducement these gentlemen presented, namely, to assist in passing your splendid tribute to the Revolutionary soldiers, who were only prevented from fighting by the cruel imprisonment within the precincts of your district.

A hundred years have gone, and you propose to honor those suffering patriots by a fit and tasteful monument. I trust that you will have no impediment for so patriotic and laudable a measure.

I was sorry to hear that you intended after this Congress to retire from public life. If your intention be not reconsidered, I give you my heart, and vote for a retiracy with such a patriotic "act" as the monument you propose.

It will forever commemorate your memory also among the good people you have served so faithfully.

You may not know, and no one may care to know, that all the blood I have is from Revolutionary folk.

When some one asked Joseph Hopkinson, the auther of "Hail, Columbia," what was the inspiration of that national lyric, he replied "that it was to inspire an American spirit which should be independent of and above the interests and passion and policy of parties, so that we might look and feel exclusively for our honor and our rights."

This song, which, I may say with pride, was penned by one of my own blood, although written for a theatrical representation in Philadelphia, had much to do with harmonizing the American spirit and the American Congress, which was sitting in that city at the time. It is even said that it was sung by members of Congress in the streets at night, to show their devotion to the one great thought of the American unity.

Without inquiring into the lyric and other habits of early Congressmen, may I hope that the members of the Fiftieth Congress—the centenary Congress, in fact—if they can not to-night sing my ancestral "Hail, Columbia," will think in all gentleness of the miseries of the imprisoned patriots, and build by your law a monumental thought in enduring material, that will serve to glorify our elder patriotism.

It is only a previous engagement, which I can not break, that prevents my presence to aid your generous wishes.

With esteem,

S. S. COX.

Hon. FELIX CAMPBELL.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, an incorporated society of the city of Brooklyn, under the title of the "Society of Old Brooklynites," would respectfully represent:

That the remains of more than 11,500 martyrs to the cause of liberty lie entombed in this city who died during our Revolutionary war on board the prison-ships of the British at the Wallabout, and which were buried on our shores during that memorable struggle, many of which were by the action of the waves washed out of their shallow graves, their bones scattered along the beach, exposed to the summer's sun and winter's storms, until the year 1808, when the Tammany Society of Columbian Order, of the city of New York, had them collected and buried with imposing ceremonies, in which the governors of several States, mayors of cities, and civil, military, and ecclesiastical dignitaries from all parts of the country took part.

The place of burial was on Jackson street, in this city, and the tomb, a temporary wooden structure, in which they were placed, became so dilapidated by reason of changes made in the surroundings and from natural decay that the sacred remains were again exposed to the gaze of the multitude, until the park commissioners of this city, with the sanction of the city government, prepared with great care and expense a permanent and imperishable tomb for their reception on the historic ground of Fort Greene, a charming elevation in Washington Park, in this city, overlocking the scene of their sufferings and death, to which the sacred remains were carefully removed and deposited.

Those devoted patriots, from every one of the original thirteen States, were prisoners of war, taken by the British army and navy, and numbered more than were killed in all the battles, both by sea and land, in that long and desperate struggle for freedom.

When it is remembered that constant and unremitting efforts were made by the British officers to induce these prisoners to purchase their freedom and save their lives by enlisting in the service of the enemy; that many, probably the majority of them, had families who were suffering by reason of their absence; that to remain in these horrible prisons was almost certain death, and that under all these circumstances they remained faithful to the cause in which they had enlisted, and preferred death to dishonor, we must concede that they earned the title of "Martyrs of the Prison Ships," and deserve such recognition from the Government, to aid in the establishment of which they sacrificed their lives, as will show to the world that republics are not ungrateful, but that we cherish their memories, honor their devotion to their country, and will erect such an enduring monument to commemorate their virtues as will stimulate future generations to emulate their patriotism.

We therefore most respectfully ask that your honorable body will make an appropriation of not less than $100,000 toward the erection of a suitable monument to be erected at or near the spot where their sacred remains now lie, the site for which will be donated for that purpose by the city of Brooklyn.

This society will most cheerfully give all the aid in their power toward the accomplishment of the object of this petition.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. HUNTER,
President.
SAMUEL A. HAYNES,
Secretary.

BROOKLYN, January 5, 1888.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, citizens of the United States, do respectfully and earnestly pray your honorable body to hear and grant the petition of the Society of Old Brooklynites, and to cause the erection of the long-delayed monument to the "Martyrs of the Prison-Ships."

Descendants of Timothy Dorgan, patriot, and martyr of prison-ship Old Jersey:

REBECCA D. MANNIE,
ANDREW D. HOBDAY,
CHARLES HOBDAY,
Great-grandchildren.

GEORGE A. MANNIE,

Great-great-grandchildren.

Mr. SPINOLA. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert in line 7, after the words "memory of," the words "the British;" and after "ships," in line 8, insert "at New York during the war of the American Revolution."

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, history establishes the fact that there were more lives sacrificed in the prison-ships in which the British confined the prisoners of the American Revolution than were lost in all the battles of that war. Eleven thousand and five hundred were sacrificed, men who had their liberty at command on any day when they would consent to abandon the cause of the colonies and enter the British army. There was no one day during their long confinement and suffering but the provost guard approached them and offered them their freedom if they would embrace the British cause; and, to the credit of twenty thousand American patriots who suffered on board those prison-ships, there never was but a single one who betrayed his country and left his associates and joined the British service. [Applause.] Now, sir, I will ask attention for a minute or two while I read from the history of the Wallabout prison-ships and the martyrs who died there.

I will cite one case where the British had captured a company of American soldiers in South Carolina, and the Hessian captain who commanded the enemy offered those men their freedom if they would go into the British service. Said he, after they had refused his offer:

Go, then, to your dungeons in the prison-ships where you shall perish and rot. But first let me tell you that rations which have been hitherto allowed to your wives and children shall from this moment cease forever, and you shall die assured that they are starving in the public streets and that you are the authors of their fate.

That was the declaration of that British officer to the company of American patriots that had been captured in South Carolina. A sentence so terribly awful appalled the firm soul of every listening hero.

A solemn silence followed the declaration. They cast their wondering eyes one upon the other, and valor for a moment hung suspended between love of family and love of country. Love of country at length rose superior to every other consideration, and, moved by one impulse, this glorious band of patriots thundered in the astonished ears of their persecutors: "The prison-ships and death, or Washington and our coubtry!"

[Applause and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. Speaker, I think if I had the time I could get a unanimous vote to put the sum back to $100,000, although we will accept temporarily the $50,000. [Laughter and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

I propose to read a little further before we vote. I will pass over several things which I had intended to refer to, and I will tell you how and why it is that the remains of these patriots are in the possession of the General Government. They are to-day the property of the United States.

Perhaps, however, before I come to that point I had better state that the bones of these patriots were strewn along the shores of Wallabout Bay, in the East River, where the tide had washed them out of the narrow and shallow trenches into which the British had thrown them. They were there exposed, and the Tammany Society of New York, in 1808, took the necessary steps to gather them up and see that they were properly entombed. There was a grand procession on the day on which the interment took place. There were thirteen immense coffins, each representing one of the thirteen original States, and eight pall-bearers surrounded each coffin, men who had served in the war of the Revolution.

The bones were put in a temporary tomb which was erected by Benjamin Romaine, the grand sachem, who had been instrumental in gathering them together and who owned the ground on which the tomb was erected. In 1842 the city of Brooklyn asked to have the bones turned over to it for appropriate sepulture. In reply to that application Mr. Romaine wrote:

I have guarded these sacred remains, with a reverence which perhaps at this day all may not appreciate or feel, for more than thirty years. They are now in their right place, near the Wallabout and adjoining the navy-yard. They are my property. I have expended more than $900 in and about their protection and preservation. I commend them to the protection of the General Government. I bequeath them to my country.

Thus it will be seen he gave them to the United States; he gave them to his country.

This concern is sacred to me. It lies near my heart. I suffered with those whose bones I venerate. I fought beside them. I bled with them.

This man belonged to the Army himself; he went through the whole seven years' service under Washington. He has given the remains of these men to the Americam Republic. If they had not died the martyrs' death that they did, we would have had, in my humble judgment, no American Republic to-night. Those men died to create the Union. We respect and venerate those who, in later years have died to protect and preserve the Union; why should we not remember those by means of whose sufferings the Republic itself was established?

This monument, where it is proposed to erect it, will overlook the very spot on which these men died. It will overlook the battle-field of Long Island; it will overlook the place where the gallant Maryland Regiment suffered death when the British drove them into the water. It will overlook New York Bay, the East River, and the Sound. There is no more fitting place on earth for such a monument to be erected than that proposed by the bill under consideration. I appeal to the generosity and patriotism of the American people. I ask gentlemen here to-night, in the name of justice and right, to join in perpetuating the memory of these men who died as martyrs for their country.

There is nothing so indelibly fixed on my mind as that which was painted there the first time I saw the tomb of these men. It was over sixty years ago, when I was a small boy. For fifty years the society which gathered these bones raised the flag over them on the Fourth of July. That ceremony ceased to be observed because the city of Brooklyn took possession of these remains, and they are in its charge now. I believe that the American people, if this question were submitted to them, would vote almost unanimously for any sum which might be named for this purpose. We are paying to-day $160,000 a year for the maintenance of the cemeteries in which sleep our Union dead. That is right. We are paying $40,000 or $50,000 to provide monuments or gravestones for those who have died in the service of the country. We are spending $60,000 or $80,000 a year for the construction and maintenance of roads by which those cemeteries can be approached.

All this is right. Sir, on the passage of this bill, if the thing were possible, I would have the name of George Washington called. He would vote "ay." So would his compatriot, Lafayette. [Applause.] Everybody will vote for this measure, except that British officer in the corner yonder [pointing to the picture on one side of the Hall], and the Hessians who stand behind him. They will not vote with us. I do not believe there is a Hessian on the floor of this House; therefore I expect a unanimous vote in favor of the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. FITCH. Mr. Speaker, after the presentation that my friend [Mr. SPINOLA] has made of the claim upon us of these soldiers who have no votes behind them, who have nobody to speak here as their representatives; after all that we have done for the soldiers of every war who have any friends in our districts, I think it unnecessary for me to say another word.

I am glad that my veteran colleague has presented the claims of these men in his eloquent and soul-stirring remarks, and I join my appeal to his that no gentleman will object to the recognition of the claims of these men who, a hundred years ago, served us so faithfully. We have voted pensions for the men who served us in the last war against England; we have voted pensions to the men who served us in Mexico; we have voted pensions generously to the men who served us in the last war. All we can do for these men is to put a monument over their bones, and for God's sake let us do that.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that such gentlemen as desire to do so may print remarks on this subject in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. SPINOLA. I ask unanimous consent that the sum named in the bill be made $100,000. Let us make the appropriation one worthy of the object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is already one amendment pending, the amendment heretofore offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. On the proposition of my colleague [Mr. SPINOLA] that this appropriation be made $100,000, I desire to make a statement of the circumstances under which the amount just proposed was reduced; and I believe that after the statement presented by my colleague, General SPINOLA, there will be no possibility of any one objecting to his proposition. At the time this matter came up before a suggestion was made by gentlemen who felt opposed on principle to giving away money for an object of this kind, that if the sum were reduced to $50,000 no objection would be interposed. That suggestion as a compromise was adopted. Then there was objection made by one gentleman that there was no quorum; and so the bill failed for want of a quorum.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think we can reach the object of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA] in this way: The amendment reducing the appropriation to $50,000 was adopted in Committee of the Whole. If that amendment be now voted down, the original provision for $100,000 will stand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, strike out "$100,000" and insert "$50,000."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was rejected.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. As I understand it, the appropriation now stands at $100,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read as it has been amended.

The bill was read as amended.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KILGORE. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 1.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

Mr. SPINOLA. I appeal to the gentleman from Texas to allow this bill to go over and follow the same course as other bills, the previous question being ordered and the bill to be voted on in a full House.

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir.

Mr. SPINOLA. Then I move there be a call of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope that motion will be withdrawn.

The motion to adjourn was withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is proper that the Chair should allow the Journal Clerk to call attention to just what was done, as stated in the Journal, in reference to the pending measure.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. FITCH, by unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill of the House (H. R. 1687) for the erection and completion of a monument to the memory of the victims of prison-ships at Fort Greene, Brooklyn, and the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and also an amendment submitted by Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated on the information of the Clerk that the amendment reducing the amount from $100,000 to $50,000 had only been adopted in the Committee of the Whole, but on examining the record it is found that it was also adopted in the House.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amount was reduced from $100,000 to $50,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPINOLA. If we are to die let us die with our flags flying.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment reducing the amount from $100,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. KILGORE. Division.

Several MEMBERS. Let the vote be taken on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Very well.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 54, noes 1.

Mr. KILGORE. No quorum.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Is there not a possibility of having some understanding so this bill may go over as in the other cases with the previous question ordered?

Mr. MATSON. The bill is already on its passage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand the gentleman from Texas will withdraw his point of no quorum if the amount is reduced to $50,000 and the bill is allowed to go over with the previous question ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill. I do not agree to the reduction of the amount. I ask for a vote on my demand for the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of New York. Pending that I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman from New York will give me his attention for a moment. The Committee on Military Affairs adopted a resolution that after fifteen minutes had been bestowed upon any contested bill the chairman should have the power of withdrawing the bill from the further consideration of the House if there was further objection made to it.

The gentleman from Texas proposes a compromise, which I am willing on behalf of the committee should be accepted, and I hope my friend will accept that compromise, or else I shall be compelled, in view of the action of the committee and in obedience to its order, to withdraw the pending bill. The gentleman from Texas proposes that it may go over with the previous question ordered upon its passage, with the right to amend, provided that the sum is reduced to $50,000.

Mr. SPINOLA. I am perfectly willing to wait here for a week, if it be necessary, to pass this bill.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the point of order is raised by the gentleman from Texas that no quorum is present. In view of this point can any business be transacted?

Mr. WEAVER. But that point has been withdrawn conditionally.

Mr. WARNER. But can any business be transacted until a quorum is obtained in the House, save a call of the House or an adjournment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is willing to withdraw the point of order on the conditions suggested.

Mr. SPINOLA. I understand he is willing to withdraw the point of order for the present, but——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that no quorum has voted, and the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. One moment, Mr. Speaker. I am placed in a position where I shall be compelled, in compliance with the order of the committee, to withdraw this bill.

Mr. SPINOLA. I raise the point of order that it is too late to withdraw the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I submit to the Chair that the previous question has not been ordered upon the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Regular order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The previous question has not been ordered, and no vote has been taken upon it. It is in order, I think, to withdraw the bill, and I trust that my friend from New York will not wish me to disregard the order of the committee, which he and all of the other members agreed to. Good faith, I think, demands that such action should be taken. We have already exhausted more than the time allowed by the committee on this bill.

Mr. SPINOLA. You spent an hour and a quarter here on one bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Well, there has been a great deal more time taken up on this one. I withdraw the bill.

Mr. SPINOLA. And I make the point of order that it can not be done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. Votes have been taken upon the bill and amendments, and it has been ordered to its third reading, and it can only be withdrawn now by unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I appeal to the gentleman from New York to aid me in carrying out the order of the committee. We have obtained as good a compromise as we can obtain, and I trust the gentleman will allow the bill to go over under that order.

Mr. SPINOLA. I can not consent to that.

Mr. CARUTH. If I rightly understood the extract read by the venerable gentleman from New York, a proposition was made to these persons imprisoned in the ships to desert the cause of their country and enlist under the British flag in order to escape the privation of prison life——

Mr. WHEELER. And death.

Mr. CARUTH. And death; and that it was to the credit of the prisoners, that out of all the number, but one man was willing to desert his country's flag. Now, let it go into the history of this country that when it was proposed by the American Congress to erect a monument over the bones of the dead patriots, but one man in the American Congress raised his voice in opposition to it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. KILGORE. I withdraw my proposition for a compromise.

Mr. CARUTH. Yes; withdraw it and let the people know it.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes; I do it.

Mr. FITCH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand the Chair to hold that it is not in order to withdraw the bill at this time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so holds, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In order to keep faith with the committee, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill.

Mr. SPINOLA and other members objected.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was rejected.

Mr. MATSON. I move a call of the House.

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 43, noes 12.

So a call of the House was ordered.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I renew the motion to adjourn, in view of the fact that it is evident no other business can be transacted here to-night.

Several MEMBERS. Go on with the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist upon his motion?

Mr. DOCKERY. In deference to the wishes of members around me I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms will close the doors.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Speaker, first stating that I am authorized by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] to withdraw the point of no quorum, I ask unanimous consent that the action in relation to the $100,000 shall be reconsidered——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that is not in order during a call of the House.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Not by unanimous consent?

Mr. MORRILL. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to; and further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] to withdraw the point of "no quorum," provided unanimous consent be given that the action upon the $100,000 may be reconsidered; that the yeas and nays may be considered as ordered upon it; that the previous question may be considered as ordered, and the whole subject go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I accept that.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no business of any kind is in order until a quorum is present.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The point of no quorum has been withdrawn.

Mr. MATSON. It can not be withdrawn after the record shows no quorum present until the record again shows that there is a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the record shows that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. GEAR. I make the point of order that the roll does not disclose the fact that there is not a quorum present, because the roll has not been called a second time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that when a call of the House is ordered it requires only one call of the roll. The roll has been called and 61 members have answered to their names.

Mr. GEAR. But the roll has not been called a second time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule does not require that the roll shall be called a second time when there is a call of the House.

Mr. GEAR. The absentees must be called.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will have the rule read.

Mr. GEAR. I will not give the Chair that trouble. I withdraw the point.

Mr. MAISH. If the second roll-call is proceeded with, and then further proceedings under the call are dispensed with——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has distinctly stated that it is not necessary to call the roll a second time.

Mr. MAISH. I understand that; but if, notwithstanding the statement of the Chair, we are in the process of calling the second roll, and the proceedings under the call are then dispensed with, the fact that there is not a quorum present will not be disclosed prior to the completion of the call. If, under the custom of the House, we proceed to call the roll a second time, and in the midst of that second roll-call the proceedings under the call of the House are dispensed with, the call will not disclose the fact that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MATSON. I make the point of order that after the record shows that there is no quorum present no business can be transacted, even by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That point of order was sustained by the Chair.

Mr. MATSON. Then we must either proceed with the call or adjourn, and I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. MAISH. Now we can proceed with the second roll-call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAISH] that all proceedings under the call have been dispensed with.

Mr. WEAVER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEAVER. A vote was taken by a division and it was ascertained that there was not a quorum present, and the point of no quorum having voted was made. Then a call of the House was ordered, and then all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with. It does not appear now to the Chair that there is no quorum present, because other business has intervened, and it is perfectly proper for the House to proceed at this time with any other business, until it again appears that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. The point of no quorum has been withdrawn.

Mr. MATSON. The point was withdrawn, and other business has intervened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There has been no intervening business.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move that the House take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

A MEMBER. Ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is necessary to take a recess; and there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITCH. I move a call of the House.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I wish to inquire whether if we should suspend further proceedings under the call and adjourn, this bill would not come up to-morrow morning as unfinished business immediately after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In accordance with the uniform usage the Speaker, who will occupy the chair in the morning, will pass upon the question as to what is then in order. The present occupant of the chair will, however, remark that the House to-night is acting under a special order; and to-morrow, being Friday, is set apart for the consideration of private business.

Mr. FITCH. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is to vote upon the motion for a call of the House.

Mr. McSHANE. I suggest that this special session of the House, not being limited as to duration, may extend over to-morrow.

A MEMBER. If we continue to sit here.

Mr. McSHANE. We can take a recess to any time that may be named. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WEBER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The last motion on which we voted I believe was a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was.

Mr. WEBER. And under the rule another motion to adjourn is not in order until business has intervened.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One motion to adjourn having been negatived, another motion to adjourn is not in order until there is some intervening business.

Mr. WEBER. In order to bring properly before the House a motion to adjourn, it is necessary that a vote be taken on this motion for a call of the House; and if we vote down the motion, it will then be in order, as I understand, to move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York for a call of the House.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 27, noes 6.

So the motion for a call of the House was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. Can we not take a recess by unanimous consent until to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule is imperative——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There is no doubt whatever that the ruling of the Chair is absolutely correct and that there are now but two things we can do—either order a call or adjourn. I think for the benefit of all who are here we should determine which course we are going to pursue and adhere to it. My own judgment is that nothing will result from a call of the House.

Mr. WEAVER. I desire to suggest that as no quorum has voted and a call of the House has been ordered——

Mr. GALLINGER. I think we had better have the regular order.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope the gentleman will let me go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire calls for the regular order, which is the call of the roll.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Fifty-one members have answered to their names. The Clerk will now note the absentees; and the Sergeant-at-Arms will close the doors.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Clerk has called over the names but once. Should there not be a second call, which is usually had before the roll-call is considered as concluded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular practice is being followed. The Digest states—

At the conclusion of the call of the roll—which is called but once—the absentees are noted, and the doors closed; the names of the absentees are called over, and a list of those for whom no sufficient excuse is made is furnished the Sergeant-at-Arms by the Clerk.

The names of the absentees will now be called for the presentation of excuses.

Mr. ADAMS: No excuse offered.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts: No excuse offered.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan: No excuse offered.

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi: No excuse offered.

Mr. BAYNE: No excuse offered.
Mr. BELDEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. BELMONT: No excuse offered.
Mr. BIGGS.
Mr. MANSUR. I desire to ask that Mr. BIGGS be excused. He boards at the same house with myself, and I know that he is sick. He has been so for four or five days. Indeed, I advised him to-day not to think of coming here to-morrow, but to wait until Saturday. I think his condition is such that it would seriously imperil his health if he should be brought here to-night. I move that he be excused.
There being no objection, Mr. BIGGS was excused.
Mr. BINGHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. BLANCHARD: No excuse offered.
Mr. BLAND: No excuse offered.
Mr. BLOUNT: No excuse offered.
Mr. BOOTHMAN.
Mr. YODER. My colleague [Mr. BOOTHMAN] is not able to be here to-night. I ask that he be excused.
There being no objection, Mr. BOOTHMAN was excused.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky: No excuse offered.
Mr. BREWER: No excuse offered.
Mr. BROWER: No excuse offered.
Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana: No excuse offered.
Mr. BROWN, of Ohio.
Mr. CHEADLE moved that Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, be excused, and there being no objection, it was agreed to.
Mr. JOHN R. BROWN: No excuse offered.
Mr. BRUMM: No excuse offered.
Mr. BUCHANAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. BUCKALEW: No excuse offered.
Mr. BUNNELL: No excuse offered,
Mr. BURNES: No excuse offered.
Mr. BURNETT: No excuse offered.
Mr. BURROWS: No excuse offered.
Mr. BUTLER: No excuse offered.

Mr. COGSWELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. COLLINS: No excuse offered.
Mr. COMPTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. CONGER: No excuse offered.
Mr. COOPER: No excuse offered.
Mr. COTHRAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. COWLES: No excuse offered.
Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. COWLES, has been detained from the House by the sickness of his wife, and I move he be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. COX.
Mr. MAHONEY. I move that my colleague, Mr. COX, be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. CRAIN: No excuse offered.
Mr. CRISP: No excuse offered.
Mr. CROUSE.
Mr. WILLIAMS moved that Mr. CROUSE be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. CULBERSON: No excuse offered.
Mr. CUTCHEON.
Mr. TRACEY moved that Mr. CUTCHEON be excused.
The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DALZELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. DARGAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. DARLINGTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. DAVENPORT: No excuse offered.
Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama.
Mr. WHEELER. I move my colleague be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida.
Mr. DOUGHERTY. I move my colleague be excused.
A MEMBER. For what reason?
Mr. DOUGHERTY. The gentleman asks for what reason. I am not aware he knows there has been a call of the House. [Laughter.] I will not state to this House my colleague is unwell, but I will state that he is usually in attendance on the meetings of this House when his presence is necessary. I make the motion and leave the House to do as it pleases.
Mr. TRACEY. I object.
The CHAIRMAN. The noes seem to have it.
The House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 12.
So the motion was agreed to.
Mr. DAVIS: No excuse offered.
Mr. DE LANO: No excuse offered.
Mr. DIBBLE: No excuse offered.
Mr. DINGLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. DOCKERY: No excuse offered.
Mr. DUNHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. DUNN: No excuse offered.
Mr. ELLIOT: No excuse offered.
Mr. ENLOE: No excuse offered.
Mr. ERMENTROUT: No excuse offered.
Mr. FARQUHAR: No excuse offered
Mr. FINLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. FISHER: No excuse offered.
Mr. FORAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. FORD: No excuse offered.
Mr. FORNEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. FRENCH: No excuse offered.
Mr. FULLER: No excuse offered.
Mr. FUNSTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. GAY.
Mr. ROBERTSON. I move my colleague be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. GAINES.
Mr. BOWDEN. I move Mr. GAINES be excused.
The motion was agreed to.
Mr. GEST: No excuse offered.
Mr. GIBSON: No excuse offered.
Mr. GLASS: No excuse offered.
Mr. GLOVER: No excuse offered.
Mr. GOFF: No excuse offered.
Mr. GRANGER: No excuse offered.
Mr. GREENMAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. GROSVENOR: No excuse offered.
Mr. GROUT: No excuse offered.
Mr. GUENTHER: No excuse offered.
Mr. HALL: No excuse offered.
Mr. HARE: No excuse offered.
Mr. HARMER: No excuse offered.
Mr. HATCH: No excuse offered.
Mr. HAUGEN: No excused offered.
Mr. HAYDEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. HAYES: No excuse offered.
Mr. HEARD: No excuse offered.
Mr. HEMPHILL: No excuse offered.
Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa: No excuse offered.
Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois: No excuse offered.
Mr. HERBERT: No excuse offered.
Mr. HERMANN: No excuse offered.
Mr. HIESTAND: No excuse offered.

Mr. HUTTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. JACKSON: No excuse offered.
Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana: No excuse offered.
Mr. JOHNSTON, of North Carolina: No excuse offered.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina, Mr. JOHNSTON has been unwell for several weeks and not able to attend the session of the House this evening, and I ask he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FELTON. I ask my colleague, Mr. BIGGS, be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has been excused.

Mr. JONES: No excuse offered.
Mr. KELLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. KERR: No excuse offered.
Mr. KETCHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. LAFFOON: No excuse offered.
Mr. LA FOLLETTE: No excuse offered.
Mr. LAGAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. LAIDLAW: No excuse offered.
Mr. LANDES: No excuse offered.
Mr. LANE: No excuse offered.
Mr. LANHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. LATHAM: No excuse offered.
Mr. LAWLER: No excuse offered.

Mr. MCCLAMMY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCCOMAS: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCCORMICK: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCCULLOGH: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCKENNA.

Mr. MORROW. I ask that my colleague, Mr. MCKENNA, be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKINLEY.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that Mr. MCKINLEY be excused.

Mr. TRACEY. I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCSHANE. Is it in order to move to dispense with further proceedings under the call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to dispense with further proceedings.

Mr. MCSHANE. If in order, I desire to submit that motion. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 12, noes 21.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MCSHANE. My object in dispensing with the call was to move an adjournment.

Mr. MCKINNEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. MCRAE: No excuse offered.
Mr. MERRIMAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. MILLIKEN: No excuse offered.
Mr. MILLS.

Mr. ABBOTT. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. MILLS, be excused. He has not been well lately.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE: No excuse offered.
Mr. MORGAN: No excuse offered.
Mr. MORSE: No excuse offered.
Mr. NEAL: No excuse offered.
Mr. NELSON: No excuse offered.
Mr. NEWTON: No excuse offered.

Mr. PENINGTON: No excuse offered.
Mr. PERKINS: No excuse offered.
Mr. PERRY: No excuse offered.
Mr. PETERS: No excuse offered.
Mr. PHELPS: No excuse offered.
Mr. PIDCOCK: No excuse offered.
Mr. PLUMB: No excuse offered.
Mr. POST: No excuse offered.
Mr. PUGSLEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether Mr. RANDALL is excused on account of illness or not; but I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYNER: No excuse offered.
Mr. REED: No excuse offered.
Mr. RICE: No excuse offered.
Mr. RICHARDSON: No excuse offered.
Mr. ROCKWELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. ROGERS: No excuse offered.
Mr. ROMEIS: No excuse offered.
Mr. ROWELL: No excuse offered.
Mr. ROWLAND: No excuse offered.
Mr. RUSSELL, of Connecticut: No excuse offered.
Mr. RUSK: No excuse offered.
Mr. RYAN: No excuse offered.

Mr. STOCKDALE: No excuse offered.
Mr. STONE, of Kentucky.

Mr. STEELE. I ask that Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. STONE, of Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that Mr. STONE, of Missouri, be excused. I know personally his health is very poor.

There was no objection.

Mr. SYMES: No excuse offered.
Mr. TARSNEY: No excuse offered.
Mr. TAULBEE.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. TAULBEE, I understand, is quite ill, and I ask that he be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. WARNER. I did not think of it when the name was called, but I ask that Mr. BROWN, of Ohio, be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has been already excused.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR be excused. He is a man advanced in years.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I move that he be excused.

Mr. GEAR. He is quite feeble.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. So is Mr. RICE.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 10.

So the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS was agreed to.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR: No excuse offered.
Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky: No excuse offered.
Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. STEELE. I ask that Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin: No excuse offered.
Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio: No excuse offered.
Mr. THOMPSON, of California: No excuse offered.
Mr. TURNER, of Kansas: No excuse offered.
Mr. TURNER, of Georgia: No excuse offered.
Mr. VANDEVER: No excuse offered.
Mr. WADE.

Mr. WARNER. I ask that Mr. WADE be excused.

Mr. STEELE. On what account?

Mr. WARNER. On account of sickness in his family.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I object. If he is sick I am willing he shall be excused.

Mr. WARNER. He is not ill himself, but there is sickness in his family.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there further objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORROW. I ask that my colleague, Mr. VANDEVER, be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. WEST: No excuse offered.

Mr. WHITE, of Indiana: No excuse offered.

Mr. WHITE, of New York: No excuse offered.

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan: No excuse offered.

Mr. WHITING, of Massachusetts: No excuse offered.

Mr. WHITTHORNE: No excuse offered.

Mr. WICKHAM: No excuse offered.

Mr. WILBER.

Mr. MOFFITT. I ask that my colleague, Mr. WILBER, of New York, be excused on account of illness.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILKINS: No excuse offered.

Mr. WILKINSON: No excuse offered.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota: No excuse offered.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia: No excuse offered.

Mr. WISE: No excuse offered.

Mr. WOODBURN: No excuse offered.

Mr. YARDLEY: No excuse offered.

Mr. YOST: No excuse offered.

Mr. ABBOTT. I ask that Mr. CULBERSON be excused. I saw him this afternoon at the hotel and he told me that he was not well.

Mr. FITCH. I object.

Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina. I know he is not well.

Mr. ABBOTT. I move that he be excused.

The question was taken; and there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 0.

So the motion was adopted.

Mr. MORROW. I am requested to ask for the excuse of Mr. ATKINSON, of Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOFFITT. I ask that Mr. MCCORMICK, of Pennsylvania, be excused. He was called home yesterday on business.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCSHANE. Mr. Speaker, there have been excuses given to about 35 members. There are nearly 100 members absent from the city, so that it is impossible to secure a quorum at this time. It requires the enforced attendance of 112 members. Now it is very easily seen that it is impossible to secure the attendance, in addition to the number here present, of 112 members, or anything like that number, and therefore I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FITCH. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. FITCH. The gentleman has stated his reasons.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not understand the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MCSHANE. I made a motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is in order. The question is upon the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 21.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Is it in order to call for tellers?

Mr. FELIX CAMPBELL. There is a resolution on the Clerk's desk I wish to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody, and bring to the bar of the House, such of the members as are now absent without leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KILGORE. I make the point of order on this. [Cries of "Regular Order!"] Does it require an order of the House for the Sergeant-at-Arms to enforce the attendance of members?

Several MEMBERS. It does.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHAW. Is it in order to move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SHAW. I make that motion, and trust that it will be agreed to.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 20, noes 24.

So the House refused to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. MCSHANE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Tellers were demanded, but were not ordered, only 16 voting in favor thereof.

On the motion to adjourn there were—ayes 22, noes 21.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes a. m., Friday, July 20, 1888) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

By Mr. BAYNE: Of veterans of Pittsburgh and of citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania.

The following petition, praying for the enactment of a law providing temporary aid for common schools, to be disbursed on the basis of illiteracy, was referred to the Committee on Education:

By Mr. CANDLER: Of the board of education and 171 citizens of Gwinnett County, Georgia.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 20, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of May 8, 1888, papers containing certain information in relation to employés in the internal-revenue service, district of Maryland; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Select Committee to Examine into the Condition of the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of June 25, 1888, a statement showing the full complement of officers and the full complement of men which will be required for the Chicago and each of the other fourteen vessels, and for the Puritan and each of the other ironclads mentioned in the Department's report for 1887; which, on motion of Mr. HALE, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of citizens of Jefferson County, Alabama, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. QUAY presented petitions of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Industry Council, No. 163, of Reading, Pa.; of Chester Council, No. 36, of Chester, Pa.; of Washington Council, No. 1, of Germantown, Pa.; of Phillipsburgh Council, No. 24, of Water Cure, Pa.; of Rochester Council, No. 140, of Rochester, Pa.; of American Council, No. 30, of Philadelphia, Pa.; of Belmont Council, No. 190, of Philadelphia, Pa.; of Lackawanna Council, No. 81, of Taylorport, Pa.; of Alliquippa Council, No. 67, of McKee's Rocks, Pa.; of Schuylkill Council, No. 12, of Philadelphia, Pa.; of Farragut Council, No. 146, of Bellevue, Pa.; of Reliable Council, No. 90, of Allegheny, Pa.; of Bainbridge Council, No. 128, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; of Summit Council, No. 173, Lemont Furnace, Fayette County, Pennsylvania; of Susquehanna Council, No. 89, of Wrightsville, Pa.; of Mayflower Council, No. 159, of Derry, Pa.; of Iron City Council, No. 171, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; of Riverside Council, No. 87, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; of Penn Council, No. 106, of Penn's Station, Pa.; of Tarentum Council, No. 91, of Tarentum, Pa.; of Smoky City Council, No. 119, of Pittsburgh, Pa.; of Scranton Council, No. 197, of Scranton, Pa.; of Hazel Glen Council, No. 208, of Pittsburgh, Pa., and of Americus Council, No. 218, of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill 553, to regulate immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Dr. M. V. Johnson, Dr. A. B. Peak, and Dr. Frank Y. Herbert, citizens of Holden, Johnson County, Missouri, engaged in the practice of dentistry, praying for the removal or reduction of duties on dental instruments, teeth, gold foil, alloys, cements, and other articles used in the dental profession; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of John M. Sneed, J. S. Stephens, I. M. Palmer, and other citizens of Pettis County, Missouri, praying for the passage of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. VANCE presented a petition of citizens of Wayne County, North Carolina, praying for certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of 58 citizens of Logan County, Ohio; a petition of 108 citizens of Noble County, Ohio; a petition of 51 citizens of Mitchell, Kans.; a petition of 32 citizens of San Francisco, Cal.; a petition of 14 citizens of Karnes, Tex.; a petition of 14 citizens of Kendall, Tex.; a petition of 14 citizens of Lake, Ill.; a petition of 30 citizens of Hamilton, Tex.; a petition of 32 citizens of Kenosha, Wis.; a petition of 36 citizens of Bandera, Tex.; and a petition of citizens of El Paso, Tex., praying for the passage of legislation affording protection to the wool-growing and woolen-manufacturing industries of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Library, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2998) for the relief of Lieut. Col. Charles G. Sawtelle, Deputy Quartermaster-General, United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. 7452) for the relief of the Southern Illinois Normal University.

Mr. FARWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 441) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape, reported adversely thereon and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 7160) granting an increase of pension to A. W. Rose;

A bill (H. R. 8677) granting a pension to Mary E. Forren;

A bill (H. R. 817) granting a pension to Mary Foster;

A bill (H. R. 8574) granting a pension to Sallie T. Ward, widow of the late W. T. Ward; and

A bill (H. R. 8794) granting a pension to Levi Little.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1620) for the relief of Esther A. Keyser, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1917) for the relief of John R. Reynolds, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I report from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments the bill (H. R. 10556) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes. I ask that the bill may be printed as reported, and I give notice that I shall call it up at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Meanwhile the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back adversely the joint resolution (S. R. 95) providing for printing matter furnished by the Bureau of Ethnology relating to researches and discoveries connected with the study of the North American Indians, and in lieu thereof to report a concurrent resolution. I ask for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will be indefinitely postponed. The concurrent resolution reported by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 6,000 copies of any matter furnished by the Bureau of Ethnology relating to researches and discoveries connected with the study of the North American Indians; the same to be issued in parts and the whole to form an annual volume of bulletins; 1,000 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

DECORATION DAY.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I report from the Committee on the District of Columbia without amendment the bill (H. R. 10053) making May 30 a holiday in the District of Columbia. I ask, unless there be objection from some Senator, that the bill be passed. I shall offer nothing except the report that comes from the committee of the House of Representatives, and I think it is embodied in only eight lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by him. It will be read at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the 30th day of May in each year, usually called "Decoration Day," shall be, and hereby is, made a holiday within the District of Columbia as fully in all respects as are the days mentioned as holidays in section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3357) referring the claim of William E. Wilson to the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill—the amendment providing for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army. I move that the amendment be printed, and that it be referred, with the accompanying documents, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

POSTAL TABLET.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire into and report upon the expediency of allowing an article known as the postal tablet or private postal card, the weight of which shall not exceed half an ounce, to pass through the mails at the rate of 1 cent for postage.

Mr. CULLOM. I present papers to accompany the resolution, which I move be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

LIENS OF JUDGMENTS AND DECREES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8180) to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same.

JAMES F. WILSON,
WM. M. EVARTS,
J. Z. GEORGE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JOHN S. HENDERSON,
WM. E. FULLER,
JNO. H. ROGERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As the House of Representatives has receded from its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agreed to the same, I suppose there is no necessity for action upon the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No action is required on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 8873) in relation to bonds of disbursing or other officers, and to monthly payment of the Army;

A bill (H. R. 9298) releasing the estate of Asher R. Eddy, late lieutenant-colonel and quartermaster-general United States Army, deceased, and George W. Gibbs and R. L. Ogden, sureties on his official bond;

A bill (H. R. 10624) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn.; and

A bill (H. R. 10869) to construct a road from Florence, S. C., to the national cemetery adjacent thereto.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 735) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house on the highland (mainland) to the westward of Crooked River, Florida; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BROWNSVILLE, TEXAS.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9512) for the erection of a public building at Brownsville, Tex.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. COKE. In line 4, after the word "authorized," the word "any" instead of "and" occurs. It should read "authorized and directed." It is evidently a clerical mistake, the letter "y" having been put where there should have been a "d."

Mr. COCKRELL. It is not worth while to make that amendment. The clerks can correct that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that the engrossed bill is probably correct and that the error occurs only in the printed bill. If it should appear to be otherwise the amendment will be made.

If there be no amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND COURT.

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider the bill (S. 2042) to establish a United States land court, and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain States and Territories.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. COCKRELL. In connection with that motion, I should like to suggest and move that the Chair cause the rooms around the galleries to be cleared so that the doors there may be opened during the executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10679) to grant the right of way through the military reservation at Fort Morgan to the Birmingham, Mobile and Navy Cove Harbor Railway Company, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

LIFE-SAVING STATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives on the bill (S. 1856) to establish a life-saving station on the Atlantic coast between Indian River Inlet, Delaware, and Ocean City, Md.

Mr. GRAY. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. JONES, of Nevada, Mr. FRYE, and Mr. GRAY were appointed.

STATE SOLDIERS' HOMES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MANDERSON, Mr. HAWLEY, and Mr. HAMPTON were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 8873) in relation to bonds of disbursing or other officers, and to monthly payments of the Army;

A bill (H. R. 9298) releasing the estate of Asher R. Eddy, late lieutenant-colonel and quartermaster-general, United States Army, deceased, and George W. Gibbs and R. L. Ogden, sureties on his official bond;

A bill (H. R. 10869) to construct a road from Florence, S. C., to the national cemetery adjacent thereto; and

A bill (H. R. 10679) to grant the right of way through the military reservation at Fort Morgan to the Birmingham, Mobile and Navy Cove Harbor Railway Company, and for other purposes.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. SPOONER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1465) for the erection of a public building in the city of Chicago, Ill., reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 3358) for the relief of M. S. Hellman, of Canyon City, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 3359) to prevent discrimination in the selling of literary matter, newspapers, journals, periodicals, or magazines on railway trains, in railway stations, on steam-ships, or steam-ship docks; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS introduced a bill (S. 3360) to provide for a road along Rock Creek; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOLPH. I appeal to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] to allow his bill to continue to be the unfinished business and to be temporarily laid aside. It is not probable that it can be disposed of this afternoon, and I understand that some Senators who wish to speak upon it are not ready. I ask that it may be temporarily laid aside, and that unanimous consent be given to take up the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, Senate bill 3304, to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, which may be disposed of in an hour or probably less.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to say, after conferring with Senators, that to-morrow and from that time on I shall feel it my duty to insist upon the consideration of the fisheries treaty.

Mr. COCKRELL. We could not hear on this side what notice the Senator from Ohio gave.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said that to-morrow, Saturday, I propose that the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the fisheries treaty, upon which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has the floor, and on which other Senators are prepared to speak. In order to close it so as to get it out of the way, I shall ask the Senate to proceed with it to-morrow and so on from day to day until it is disposed of.

Mr. TELLER. I only wish to say that I shall be prepared to go on to-morrow, immediately after the disposition of the formal morning business.

Mr. CHANDLER. In this connection I desire to offer a resolution intended to be proposed by me in connection with the treaty, and I ask that it be printed and lie over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over under the rule.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved. That the power to make treaties and to appoint all high public officers of the United States being vested in the President and Senate jointly, the President has no right under his implied power of making preliminary negotiations of treaties to appoint, without the concurrence of the Senate, private citizens as plenipotentiaries to make and sign such treaties in behalf of the United States; and that the recent appointment by the President, without the consent of the Senate, of James B. Angell and William L. Putnam as special plenipotentiaries to make and sign the proposed fishery treaty with Great Britain, dated February 15, 1888, was unwarranted by the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over under the rule and be printed.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

COMING OF CHINESE LABORERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, be informally laid inside for the purpose of enabling him to move the consideration of Order of Business 1801, being the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, it will help to an understanding of the necessity for the legislation proposed by this bill to state the substance of existing legislation on the subject of Chinese immigration, and to call attention to the defects in such legislation which have been disclosed by experience.

When the sentiment upon the Pacific coast in favor of the exclusion of Chinese laborers had become so strong as to force recognition by the Government, the treaty of November 17, 1880, was negotiated, by which the United States was authorized to limit or suspend the coming of Chinese laborers into the United States, but not wholly to prohibit it. It was provided in the treaty that Chinese laborers who were then in the United States should be allowed to go and come at their own free will, and should be accorded all the rights, privileges, and immunities which are accorded by this Government to the citizens and subjects of the most favored nations.

By the act of May 6, 1882, the coming of Chinese laborers to this country was suspended for the period of ten years, but by section 2 of the act it was provided such suspension should not apply to Chinese laborers who were in the United States on the 17th of November, 1880, or who should come into the United States before the expiration of ninety days next after the passage of the act. The act further provided for the issuing of certificates to departing Chinese for the purpose of identification and as evidence of a right to return.

The amendatory act of 1884 also provided that Chinese laborers who were in the United States when the treaty took effect, and who came into the United States within ninety days after the passage of the act of May 6, 1882, should be entitled to depart from this country and to return again. As to those laborers who departed after November 17, 1880, and before the act of May 6, 1882, went into effect, there was no record or official evidence of their right to return, and when they returned they were held by the courts to be entitled to prove their right to land in the same manner as any other question of fact is established in court.

The question was raised by the collector of customs at San Francisco whether the act of 1882 was retrospective or prospective only, whether Chinese laborers departing from the United States after November 17, 1880, but before the certificates were issued under the act of May 6, 1882, could return without certificates. The collector claimed that they could not, and the courts decided that they could.

The controversy was renewed under the act of 1884, which declared the certificate to be conclusive of the right to return. The collector contended that the courts had no authority or jurisdiction to interfere by habeas corpus to discharge Chinese who departed before the act of May 6, 1882, could be put into operation and had no certificate and who were refused permission to land by him. The United States courts held that every Chinaman claiming the right to land on account of residence in the United States prior to the date when the act of May 6, 1882, went into effect had a right to have the question of previous residence tried in court as a question of fact. The Supreme Court of the United States recently affirmed the judgment of the court below in one of these cases. This controversy caused great inconvenience to the courts and business community. In a letter which was before the Committee on Foreign Relations when the subject of Chinese restriction was considered, United States District Judge Hoffman states that there were at the time, when the letter was written, five hundred Chinese waiting to try their right to land in the United States in the United States courts in San Francisco by habeas corpus, and that two more vessels were due with others. I find in one of the San Francisco papers a copy of a letter from Judge Hoffman to Representative FELTON, of California, dated January 10, 1888, which so forcibly presents the situation that I will present it in full.

The letter is as follows:

"SAN FRANCISCO, January 16, 1888.

"MY DEAR FELTON: The newspapers announce that you have introduced a bill for the abrogation of the treaty stipulations with China respecting Chinese immigration. You know the temper of Congress better than I do, but I have serious misgivings as to your ability to induce it to pass an act in open and avowed violation of the Burlingame and Switt treaties. It is surely not good statesmanship to forego what is practicable and attainable by attempting what may be desirable but in fact is unattainable.

"It is of paramount and indispensable importance that something should be done to relieve the courts of the intolerable nuisance and obstruction to their regular business caused by the Chinese cases. If they continue in the future as numerous as in the past, it is not too much to say that the constant services of one judge will be necessary to dispose of them.

"Judge Sabin has been here on a summons of Judge Sawyer for one month, almost exclusively engaged in trying Chinese habeas corpus cases. There still remain on the calendars of the two courts in the neighborhood of two hundred and fifty cases undisposed of. The steamers arrive tri-monthly, and it may be anticipated that they will continue to bring their usual complement of Chinese passengers, especially when news shall have reached China that a law forbidding their coming has been proposed, and may be passed, unless something is done speedily.

"I know not how courts can deal with this mass of business. Judge Sabin and Judge Ross have both their own duties to attend to, and further work, except when they occasionally devote some weeks to our relief, will fall upon the circuit judges and myself.

"The prospect fills we with dismay and almost with despair. It appears to me if you even think you can succeed in inducing Congress to abrogate the treaty, it can only be done after preliminary negotiations with China, or at least after some notice to that Government of our intention to no longer be bound by our solemn treaty stipulations, and I need not remind you that Chinese negotiations once entered upon will postpone all prospects of relief for an almost indefinite period.

"Judge Sawyer and myself have both pointed out some simple measures which I presume could be readily got through Congress, and which will effect the object we are so anxious to attain.

"The first is to pass a law providing that after a reasonable notice, say of two or three months' notice, the right to enter the country on ground of previous residence shall no longer be recognized. This simple act would at once dispose of perhaps three-quarters or more of the cases presented to us. I think there can be no objection to such a law on the ground of breach of public faith. When it goes into effect, even if passed at once, the Chinese will have had six years to exercise the privilege of returning on the ground of previous residence.

"It is not unreasonable that when the courts have devoted so much time and the Government has incurred so much expense in investigating the validity of these claims, and the courts have been in so many cases the victims of perjury and fraud, which it is impossible to detect, we should say that we can not longer afford to occupy the time of our tribunals in these investigations, and we have a right to notify the Chinese that if the privilege is not availed of within a short and designated period, to be fixed by law, it shall be deemed to have been waived.

"If you could have attended court and listened to the hearing of any of these cases, you would have recognized how completely the court is at the mercy of Chinese testimony and how impossible it is to distinguish a genuine case from a fraudulent one.

"The other suggestion relates to the form of certificates. To simply enact that the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the form of the red certificate to be delivered to outgoing Chinamen would, I think, put a stop to the frauds which have been practiced with regard to these papers on so extensive a scale. If such a law can be passed the Secretary should direct that the certificates should be all blank but the number. It will, therefore, contain on its face no information to the party fraudulently procuring it as to age, occupation, physical peculiarities, or even name or sex of the person to whom it was issued. All these particulars should be taken and recorded in the custom-house book at the time the certificate is issued.

"On the presentation, therefore, of any certificate, none but the person to whom it was issued could be able to answer a single question showing he was the person to whom the certificate was issued. A few questions put to the person presenting it would at once show that the certificate had been issued to another party whom he was attempting to personate.

"These provisions, I think, and especially the first, would relieve us to such an extent that we might, without great inconvenience, grapple with the remaining cases. I invite your most careful attention to this, and unless you are sure you can get the bill through which you proposed, I beg you to direct your attention to these two matters which, upon proper explanation, ought to encounter no opposition, and which would, as I have said, effectually relieve us of this intolerable burden. I hope you will consider these suggestions very seriously.

"I am deeply interested in the matter, and unless something is done I do not see how Judge Sawyer or myself can discharge the ordinary duties of our office. Sickness and disability of any kind on the part of either of us for any length of time would produce an accumulation of cases on the calendar which would be simply appalling.

"I am authorized by Judge Sawyer to say that he entirely concurs in the foregoing suggestions.

"Very truly, yours,

"OGDEN HOFFMAN."

To cure defects in previous legislation restricting Chinese immigration the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations during the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress reported a bill which passed the Senate, but did not receive consideration in the House. Early in the present session there was reported to the Senate from the same committee another bill more simple but more effective in its provisions than the one reported at the last Congress, which has not been acted upon on account of the pendency of the treaty with the Chinese Government negotiated since the bill was reported.

That bill in my judgment, if it had become a law, would have been a substantial improvement upon existing laws. Its provisions, in the opinion of many, would have accomplished substantially what will have been secured if the pending treaty is ratified. The second section of that bill is what may be termed a statute of limitations upon the exercise of the right of Chinese laborers to return to the United States who were in the United States when the treaty of November 17, 1880, took effect, or who afterwards came into the United States and departed prior to August 6, 1882, without a return certificate. Such a limitation was believed by the circuit judge of the United States for the ninth circuit and by the United States district judge for the northern district of California to be a reasonable restriction, and not a violation of treaty stipulations, and would have afforded relief to the United States courts at San Francisco, which are now overwhelmed with habeas-corpus cases brought by Chinese seeking to land in the United States on the ground of prior residence, and which obstruct the regular business of the court and greatly inconvenience the public.

In the mean time the pending treaty with the Chinese Government was negotiated, which will, if ratified, and it seems probable it will be, with appropriate legislation, cut off the right to return to the United States of Chinese laborers who have not availed themselves of that right under existing laws at the date of the ratification of the treaty, and to some extent will restrict the right of Chinese laborers residing in the United States and leaving the country after the date of the treaty to return again. The important provisions of the treaty are as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited; and this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

ARTICLE II.

The preceding article shall not apply to the return to the United States of any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife, child, or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of $1,000, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement. Nevertheless, every such Chinese laborer shall, before leaving the United States, deposit, as a condition of his return, with the collector of customs of the district from which he departs, a full description in writing of his family, or property, or debts, as aforesaid, and shall be furnished by said collector with such certificate of his right to return under this treaty as the laws of the United States may now or hereafter prescribe and not inconsistent with the provisions of this treaty; and should the written description aforesaid be proved to be false, the right of return thereunder, or of continued residence after return, shall in each case be forfeited.

And such right of return to the United States shall be exercised within one year from the date of leaving the United States; but such right of return to the United States may be extended for an additional period, not to exceed one year, in cases where by reason of sickness or other cause of disability beyond his control, such Chinese laborer shall be rendered unable sooner to return, which facts shall be fully reported to the Chinese consul at the port of departure, and by him certified to the satisfaction of the collector of the port at which such Chinese subject shall land in the United States. And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the return certificate herein required.

ARTICLE III.

The provisions of this convention shall not affect the right at present enjoyed of Chinese subjects, being officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, but not laborers, of coming to the United States and residing therein. To entitle such Chinese subjects as are above described to admission into the United States they may produce a certificate from their Government or the Government where they last resided, visaed by the diplomatic or consular representative of the United States in the country or port whence they depart.

It is also agreed that Chinese laborers shall continue to enjoy the privilege of transit across the territory of the United States in the course of their journey to or from other countries, subject to such regulations by the Government of the United States as may be necessary to prevent said privilege of transit from being abused.

These provisions relating to the right of Chinese laborers who have been in the United States, and have departed to return again, and the right of Chinese laborers now in the United States to depart and return, take effect upon the exchange of ratifications, and in order to provide the necessary regulations for executing them it is important that an act should be passed to take effect when the treaty goes into operation. This is provided for in the bill now under consideration. I will not discuss the bill in detail unless some question arises in regard to some of its provisions.

It is intended to carry into effect the provisions of the treaty to provide necessary regulations to prevent the abuse of their privilege by the classes of Chinese authorized under the treaty to come to, and reside in, or pass through, the United States and to provide against the evasion of its provisions by the classes prohibited from entering the United States. Neither the treaty nor this bill is all that was desired by the majority of the people of the Pacific coast, but in my judgment, if this bill becomes a law and is faithfully executed, it will go far to remedy the evils complained of.

The proposition to pass a bill to take effect upon the exchange of ratifications is approved by the State Department, and it is understood that the bill introduced in the House by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was either prepared or sanctioned by the Department. The Chinese Government understand that Chinese laborers are to be excluded from and after the date of the ratification of the treaty, and much annoyance and trouble will be avoided both to Chinese subjects and to our Government if the necessary legislation for carrying the provisions of the treaty into execution is had before it takes effect. The Chinese Government has undertaken to prevent its subjects from emigration to the United States. By an edict of that Government Chinese subjects who have not been in this country are forbidden to emigrate, and Chinese subjects who have once been here and returned to China are prohibited from returning unless they have left behind them a family or property. The Chinese immigration to this country is not to any considerable extent from Chinese ports, but is mainly from British ports in China.

I do not propose to discuss the Chinese question at length at this time. A very large majority of the people of the Pacific coast believe that the immigration of Chinese laborers into this country is an unmixed evil and that it should be at once prohibited. The reasons urged for this are numerous. I shall allude but to a few of them. All Chinese laborers in this country belong to one of six Chinese companies, are coolies under contract with the companies to which they belong, and are virtually slaves, and Chinese women in San Francisco and Portland are as much a merchantable commodity as slaves were in the slave-holding States in the ante-bellum days.

My own experience and observation lead me to the belief that the Chinese laborers and lower classes of Chinese in this country do not regard either our laws or the obligation of an oath as administered in our courts of justice as binding upon them, and that our judicial tribunals are more likely to be resorted to and our laws invoked by them for the purpose of revenge or to compel obedience to the decrees of their own secret and unlawful tribunals than for a legitimate purpose. It is notorious that the Chinese on the Pacific coast maintain a Chinese government of their own, which enforces in its own way its own laws and regulations.

The importation of Chinese into this country is the introduction of a non-assimilating element; a people separated from ours by an impassable gulf; the bringing together of diverse civilization which can not blend; the introduction of a source of irritation calculated to arouse in the laboring classes violent passions to disturb the peace of communities and lead to disorders and outrages which can neither be prevented nor properly punished.

There is danger also to be apprehended to our national prosperity from the unrestricted immigration into this country of Chinese. With the 404,000,000 of the inhabitants of China struggling for existence, the increased and increasing facilities for reaching the Pacific coast from her shores, and the increasing demand for cheap labor by our great manufacturing institutions, if immigration had not been restricted until this time it is more than possible that to-day the industrial interests of the coast would have been largely in the possession of that people, who work cheaper and live upon less than the Caucasian race, and who therefore naturally supplant that race in the labor markets of the world whenever they come in competition with it.

The controlling reason with me for the exclusion of Chinese labor is that the characteristics of the race are such that Chinese laborers in the United States, no matter how limited their number, are necessarily in competition with the white laborer. The Chinaman works for one-half the wages necessary for the support of the American laborer. He is a mere sojourner here, and is not a consumer to any considerable extent of American products. He hoards his earnings, but not to enrich this country. He supplants white labor, the rewards of which would be kept in this country, and carries away with him his accumulated gains.

I will not discuss his vices nor dwell upon the demoralization and ruin caused by the opium joints and gambling dens and other centers of vice and immorality he brings with him. It has been said, and there is truth in the saying, that the virtues of the Chinese are more harmful to us than their vices. Their economy, their simple wants, which enable them to live on one-fourth the amount required to support an American laborer, make their competition with white laborers in the labor markets of the Pacific coast the most serious objection to their presence. The sentiment so long prevailing in this country that America should be the asylum of the oppressed and down-trodden, if not of the refuse of all other nations, is fast losing its hold upon the American people. We are being educated up to the idea that with governments as with individuals, self-preservation is the first law of nature. The Chinese laborer, considered with reference to our institutions, is nothing but a productive machine. The American laborer is much more. Under our political system he is an integral part of the Government. His vote counts for as much as that of the millionaire, and, theoretically at least, he has an equal voice with him in public affairs.

The people established and control and will continue to give direction to the Government, and if republican institutions are to be preserved the laboring man must be protected and his wages must not be reduced to the level of the wages of Asiatic coolies. He will be a safe depositary of the power of controlling the destiny of the Government no longer than he is able to command for his labor such remuneration as will enable him to live in comfort and to maintain his independence.

Every argument which is made upon this floor for the protection of the laboring man against the cheap labor of Europe is an argument against the admission of coolie labor into this country. So long as the masses in any country can be kept in ignorance and want, without the means of bettering their condition and without the power of asserting their rights—mere hewers of wood and drawers of water, the slaves of the governing classes, the rich and the powerful—monarchies and aristocracies will continue, and tyranny of the governing classes and the oppression of the laboring classes will be the rule. We will do more for the oppressed of other nations and more for humanity by preserving the independence and promoting the intelligence and virtue of our own people, perpetuating our free institutions, and giving the world the influence of our example, than we can do by admitting to our shores in accordance with a mere sentiment those whose presence will degrade American labor and deprive the laborer of his just reward.

Power to be safely used must be accompanied by intelligence. Everywhere the tendency is to the distribution of power among the people. The men who toil on the farm, in the shop and factory, and in the mines, who operate the railroads, navigate the ships, and carry on the commerce of the world—the laboring men—are yet to control the political affairs of all nations and to give direction to all the governments of the earth. Not this year or this century perhaps, but as sure as intelligence and capacity for self-government is increasing among men and love of liberty is spreading among the nations, just so sure will republican governments—"governments of the people, by the people, and for the people"—some day take the place of the monarchies of the earth. This is not to be brought about by leveling down the rewards of labor in America and reducing the condition of the laborer here to that of the laborer in other countries, but power of self-government to the masses of other countries will be preceded by an improvement in their condition, increased compensation for their labor, increased intelligence, and greater independence, all of which must be mainly worked out by the people of each country for themselves.

Not only the future of this country and the prosperity of our people but the future destiny of the race is inseparably connected with the condition of the men and women who toil with their hands.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the object of this bill is to enforce the provisions of a treaty heretofore made between the United States and his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of China, and which treaty was ratified with certain amendments proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body and agreed to by the Senate, some time ago, and which was forwarded, as I understand, to the Chinese Government for its rejection or approval of the amendments proposed by the Senate. This bill provides in terms that it shall only become operative from and after the date of exchange of the ratification of the treaty between the two Governments. As an act of legislation for the purpose intended, that is to say, the enforcement of the provisions of the treaty referred to, I regard it as the very best possible bill that could be presented.

So far as I am concerned personally, I have no faith in the treaty itself. I never did have any faith in it; I have no faith in it now. I believe it will be a failure in so far as it may be considered as a means of prohibiting Chinese immigration.

The treaty as it came to the Senate originally and before it was amended by the Senate was, in my judgment, a step backward, and a long step backward from the position we occupied under existing treaties and under existing laws. As amended by the Senate, however, I consider the treaty at least no worse than the existing treaty; but I am unable to bring myself to the conclusion that it is any better.

But, as I said, conceding that this treaty so ratified by the Senate will meet the approval of the Chinese Government, I regard this bill as the very best possible bill that could be presented and passed by Congress, and at the same time keep within the provisions of the new treaty, as the purpose of this bill is to legislate under the provisions of the new treaty. In fact, if the amendments made by the Senate to the new treaty are not accepted by the Chinese Government, this legislation never becomes operative.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill is to take effect on the exchange of ratifications of the treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what I have just said, that the bill only becomes operative on the agreement of the Chinese Government to the Senate amendments to the treaty.

I shall vote for this bill because it is the very best possible measure that we can hope to have enacted into law. It is the very best possible measure, as I said before, that can be devised, in my judgment, and keep within the provisions of the proposed treaty; but the treaty itself, in my judgment, is a sham, a fraud, and a deception, and will not meet the expectations either of the President of the United States or of his Secretary of State, or of the members of the Senate on either side of the Chamber who gave it their approval with the amendments adopted by the Senate.

This seems to be the opinion of the leading journals of the Pacific coast. I have here an editorial from the San Francisco Call, a leading journal of San Francisco, which I will ask to have read, that expresses what seems to be the view of the people generally of the Pacific coast in reference to this new treaty. I ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BERRY in the chair). The paper will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE TWO CHINESE TREATIES CONTRASTED.

The Swift-Angell Chinese treaty is the one now in existence. It has two weak points—one which provides that "Chinese laborers now in the United States shall be allowed to go and come of their own free will and accord," and one which admits teachers, students, merchants, and travelers in such terms that laborers have been included in one class or another. The second or amended restriction act provided for the enforcement of the treaty in terms which re-enforced the two weak points in the treaty we have referred to. The act provided that prior residents must come with certificates to show the fact of such prior residence, and also placed safeguards around the admission of Chinese laborers under pretense of being merchants, students, or travelers.

This second or amended restriction act would be, fairly executed, a tolerable solution of the Chinese question. The friends of white labor would have preferred that Chinese once departing should stay departed, but with the safeguards the law set up to prevent Chinese from "returning" who had never been here we would have got along very well.

The action of the Federal courts in admitting Chinese on the plea of prior residence without the evidence the law required greatly impaired the efficiency of the law. The action of the Treasury Department in letting in Chinese in transit made another hole in the act. Instead of seeking to enforce the act in the spirit in which it had been passed, the Administration conceived the idea of negotiating a new treaty. This new treaty, as the Call has before said, is a sham. It does not permit of a law which will keep out a single Chinaman whom the employers of that class of labor desire to let in.

The new treaty provides in the second article that the prohibition clause in the first article shall not apply to any Chinese laborer who has a lawful wife in the United States.

To any Chinese laborer who has a child in the United States.

To any Chinese laborer who has a parent in the United States.

To any Chinese laborer who has $1,000 worth of property in the United States, which property may be in the form of credits—that is, of debts due the applicant.

The third article of the treaty provides that the new treaty shall not affect the rights at present enjoyed by Chinese subjects being officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for curiosity or pleasure, of coming to the United States. The third article also provides that "Chinese laborers shall continue to enjoy the privilege of transit across the territory of the United States in the course of their journey to or from other countries." The last provision is putting in the form of an express stipulation the privilege Chinese laborers had enjoyed by virtue of a ruling of the Treasury Department. An opening which the Treasury Department had made was thus recognized and confirmed by the new treaty.

A Senate amendment to the treaty provides that this prohibition shall extend to the return of the Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under the law or not.

Whatever value this amendment may have had when it was adopted is lost in the fact that the greater part of the Chinese then in China will be in the United States before a law can be enforced carrying out the conditions of the treaty. They are coming now so fast that duplicate courts are established to pass them in. Once in, there will not be the slightest difficulty in getting return certificates on one of the four conditions that the treaty provides as establishing the right to such return certificate.

The transit clause holds open a door wide enough to let in all China. Any Chinese laborer may land on that plea, and any Chinese laborer found in the United States can pretend that he is in transit.

It should be borne in mind that the new law, if one is passed, will be subjected to the judicial intelligence which has destroyed the law now nominally in force. It will have to stand a hostile construction. It will be administered by courts which have shown their determination to admit Chinese, law or no law.

For these reasons the Call repeats that the work Congress should now take in hand is to see that the present law is executed rather than to enact new laws for the courts to tear to pieces.—The Morning Call, San Francisco, July 13, 1888.

Mr. MITCHELL. As further illustrating the views taken by the leading journals on the Pacific coast, I submit a short editorial from the San Francisco Bulletin, another leading paper of that city.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date of that?

Mr. MITCHELL. This was published in the issue of July 12, 1888—the present month.

Mr. MORGAN. What is the date of the other?

Mr. MITCHELL. July 13, 1888, about the same date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper sent up by the Senator from Oregon will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE.

It is rumored that there is some doubt whether the Chinese Government will approve the new treaty because of the amendments introduced by the Senate. These amendments are the only valuable parts of the measure. But we are afraid that no such good luck is before us. The scarcely concealed bribe of $276,000 to the Chinese Government will secure the ratification. If the treaty were rejected the Administration would no longer have any excuse to oppose the only legislation that will reach the root of the Chinese evil. The treaty, even as amended, can lead to nothing but the gravest complications. The fisheries treaty, which has already been cut to pieces in the Senate, was wise diplomacy in comparison with the Chinese treaty. The latter is, in fact, the most outrageous sell-out of the present Administration.

It may be regarded as a treaty to facilitate Chinese immigration. Under it this country will be flooded with Chinese. Every cooly now ashore can be duplicated as often as he departs, while new hordes can be introduced by the transit privilege. Improvised traders, students, teachers, and travelers can be brought on the scene when everything else fails. There will be no check on the latter but the visé of our consuls, and what sort of a check that will be everybody knows. If this treaty had been considered in open Senate, like the fisheries treaty, it would have been defeated, provided our representatives exhibited as much industry and ability as the New England representatives of the fishing interests of the Northeast.—Daily Evening Bulletin, San Francisco, Thursday, July 12, 1888.

Mr. MITCHELL. That represents the view, as I believe, of the people generally of the Pacific coast in regard to this treaty. Treaties have proved failures so far as inhibiting Chinese immigration is concerned. We have a treaty now with China looking to the restriction of Chinese immigration. That treaty went into effect November 17, 1881. Since then there have been 92,654 arrivals of Chinese at the port of San Francisco alone. Since January 1 last, to and including June 18, last month, 7,422 Mongols have arrived at the port of San Francisco alone. Of the arrivals 4,218 were landed on return certificates issued by the custom-house, and 3,204 on writs of habeas corpus.

There are now pending in the United States courts of San Francisco 4,000 habeas corpus cases for the release of Chinese, and more than 5,691 have arrived than departed in San Francisco in the last five and a half months.

The present treaty, the one under which we are now legislating, and which has not yet been ratified by the Chinese Government, is no improvement, in my judgment, and that seems to be the judgment of the leading journals of the Pacific coast, on the existing treaty. For that reason I opposed the treaty when it was under consideration in executive session in this body. I am opposed to it now because I do not believe it will effect the purpose intended. While that is all so, and while in all probability, as stated by my colleague, the amendments proposed by the Senate will receive the approval of the Chinese Government, in which event it will become the law of the land, then the legislation proposed is the only thing we can do and the very best thing we can do under the circumstances. Therefore I shall vote for the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I can not understand why the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] would vote for a bill to carry into effect a treaty which he says is a sham and a fraud. I do not think I have ever before heard as broad a declaration as that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not hear the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I said that I could not understand why the Senator from Oregon would vote for a bill to carry into effect a treaty that he said was a sham and a fraud. I do not remember to have ever heard such a statement as that made by any gentleman on this floor. If I believed that a treaty was a sham and a fraud I would never give any vote to carry it into effect. I might give votes, and I think I certainly would, to abrogate that treaty and to take it away from the statute-book.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have not had the opportunity.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Oregon says he would vote to abrogate this last treaty and take it off the statute-book if he had the opportunity to do it. An opportunity, Mr. President, is never wanting to a Senator to offer a bill in this body to avail himself or his constituents of that very high power, which has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to exist on the part of Congress, to abrogate any treaty. So the opportunity has been always present to the Senator from Oregon to offer a bill, and to press a bill to abrogate the treaty.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the Senator from Oregon availed himself of that opportunity and introduced a bill at this session for that very purpose, and the committee, of which the honorable Senator from Alabama is a member, smothered it in committee and never reported it.

Mr. MORGAN. Not being in the majority I am not responsible for the smothering of that infant if there was any smothering done. It is his own friends that have smothered it if any persons have, and if they did I expect they did an act of great mercy to the Senator, not to say to the Senate. But notwithstanding his having offered a bill, which he says was smothered in committee, to repeal and abrogate all Chinese treaties relating to immigration, he is here to-day to announce his purpose to support a bill to carry the last treaty into effect, which he says is a fraud and a sham.

Now, his constituency on the Pacific coast will perhaps be able to understand whether or not the Senator is sincerely the friend of proper treaty relations between the United States and China, or whether this is an effort by gathering up scraps out of newspapers to cast some odium or some slur upon gentlemen engaged in negotiations between this country and a foreign country. Without quoting a familiar adage, which relates to the condition of the bird that is not very careful about its domicile, I say that I deprecate very much indeed that constant disposition which appears on the floor of this body to disparage in the presence of mankind, of the whole world, the honor, the integrity, the wisdom, the uprightness, the forecast of our executive administration.

I have been in this body under several Republican administrations and I have yet to hear any Democrat in this body undertake merely the effort to disparage a Republican administration, no matter how much we differed with it in respect of foreign policies. I was here at an era when jingoism prevailed in the administration of this country to a very alarming extent, the effects of which we have not yet quite escaped from, certainly not the moral effects; and yet due faith and credit were given to the integrity, to the honorable purpose, to the high intention of all those Republican Presidents who negotiated treaties, whether the Democrats thought they were correct ones or not, and I think we had better return to that state of feeling, and from that sense of respect that we owe to our own country, we ought to inform the outside world that we still have negotiators who are able to handle our diplomatic affairs and that we have statesmen who are at least in love with their own country.

The history of Chinese immigration to this country, so far as it is affected by treaty, is a somewhat peculiar one. The Senator from Oregon, being a Republican, takes occasion to felicitate himself upon the progress of affairs; but I wish to read just two treaties in contrast with each other to show how under the present régime there has been an absolute reversal of that policy which was the inauguration, the beginning of the immigration of the Chinese into this land. Anson Burlingame was a distinguished American who went to China as American minister, and there commended himself by his wisdom and his ability and by his integrity to the Chinese Government to that extent that they sent him back here with plenary powers of negotiating treaties with us on subjects which had never before that time been alluded to in our treaties with China.

Mr. Burlingame came here and negotiated treaties, and the ministers who came with him on that grand errand were received on the Pacific coast with princely honors. Their purpose was declared, was perfectly well known, their coming was heralded to this capital, and the United States made a point of showing more of the magnificence of its hospitality in the welcoming of this commission to this country for the purpose of making this treaty than I remember that they have ever shown to the Prince of Wales or to any other distinguished character who has ever visited the country. Mr. Burlingame and his colleagues were received with royal honors, as far as we know how to bestow royal honors, certainly with royal hospitality. They went into conference here with Mr. Seward, who was then our Secretary of State, and in 1868 they matured and sent to the Senate of the United States for its ratification a treaty which contained these provisions:

ARTICLE V.

The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of the free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively from the one country to the other for the purposes of curiosity, of trade, or as permanent residents. The high contracting parties therefore join in reprobating any other than an entirely voluntary emigration for these purposes. They consequently agree to pass laws making it a penal offense for a citizen of the United States or Chinese subject to take Chinese subjects either to the United States or to any other foreign country, or for a Chinese subject or citizen of the United States to take citizens of the United States to China or to any other foreign country without their free and voluntary consent, respectively.

ARTICLE VI.

Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation; and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation. But nothing herein contained shall be held to confer naturalization upon citizens of the United States in China, nor upon the subjects of China in the United States.

The Chinese came; they came in floods, in torrents. They poured over the Pacific coast.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator give me the date of the treaty?

Mr. MORGAN. Eighteen hundred and sixty-eight; the Burlingame treaty.

This treaty, Mr. President, was based upon the idea, which I thought a very mistaken one indeed, that by bringing the Chinaman in contact with American civilization and American institutions, the Ethiopian would change his skin and the leopard his spots; that they would widen up into our civilization and become convertible elements in our social fabric, as well as proper factors under certain conditions even in our political institutions.

This Burlingame treaty was heralded through the Christian world as opening really the doors of salvation to the whole Chinese people. A great many preachers argued strenuously, and I hope then with great effect (but it turned out that they were mistaken about it), in favor of the proposition that if we would allow free, unobstructed immigration of the Chinese into this land, and allow them to assume here all the privileges of citizenship which belong to residence and domicile, they would incorporate themselves into our church establishments; that they would take up from us the spirit of Christianity, and would carry it abroad across the Pacific Ocean; and that the banner of the Cross would be planted upon the plains of China by Chinese hands. That was a very beautiful picture, and very attractive and charming to the American people, and I regret deeply, sir, that it has not been realized.

But they got over there among the Oregonians and the Californians and the Indians and the Mexicans, and they took to the American idea of money-making, if they did not have it before they came; and the Chinaman began to lay up treasure, not in heaven, but on earth, "the same like a Melican man," as my friend from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] very humorously suggests. The Chinaman soon by his burrowing and his cheap method of living became not only a very important factor on that coast in all its mining, railroad, and agricultural enterprises, but he became a rival of the American laborer, and a very fierce rival.

Therefore, afterwards, a new era of American Christianity arose. It was headed by Dennis Kearney and the disciples of the Sand Lots. The Chinaman and the Kearney party had it up and down, and the political parties of this country, never being oblivious to the fact of where votes are to be found, espoused the side of Dennis Kearney, because he had votes and the Chinaman did not have any. In that controversy the political tide commenced to turn against the Chinaman, and he began to go under and under.

More than that, the vicious practices of Chinese civilization, if you may call it such, barbarity really, in its lower grade, commenced to develop themselves upon that coast in such a way as that the decency of the country was severely offended. But there grew up in that country large owners of vineyards and the constructors and owners of enormous lines of railway, and Chinese cheap labor was in demand, just as foreign cheap labor is in demand on the Atlantic coast to-day, merely because it is cheap.

The employer of Chinese labor in that country had no sympathy with the man at all. He was willing to see him lie down and die when he got through his contract. It made no difference to him whether the Chinaman got anything out of his contract or not, even a living, so he was able to do his work.

Parties on the Pacific coast commenced to divide a little upon this question. The rich and the powerful few were in favor of having Chinese laborers to work their vineyards and gather the fruits of their orchards, and also to help burrow into the earth after the precious metals, to build their railroads and keep them in repair. They were found to be an extremely convenient commodity, for they were little else, in all the different employments and a vocations of life on the Pacific coast.

It began to be apparent that the Chinaman was not going to avail himself of this broad declaration of Mr. Seward and Mr. Burlingame in favor of the progress of Christianity and its development, etc., but that he was going to anchor upon the money, upon the gold dust; that after he was dead he intended to have his body taken back to his native land; and that he had no affection for this country; that you could not inspire him with it. That was the situation, and that was the state of progress in regard to the Chinese.

Nevertheless, gentlemen the world over, as far as I have ever heard of them, men of wealth, men of polite habits and manners, men who live luxuriously, want body servants. There is not a gentleman in the Senate to-day who will consent to wait upon himself in all the menial offices of life. Every man bred in this polite manner, as we call it, wants a body servant, and he is going to have him if he can get him. If he can not get an African negro in the South, he will get a Chinaman; if he can not get a Chinaman, he will get some German immigrant. It is hard to work an Irishman into it, but they sometimes even get an Irishman to put upon the decks of their carriages with their pompons and livery. Sometimes you can get an Englishman to do it.

Gentlemen will have these luxuries, and whoever has visited one of those magnificent homes in California, than which there exists nowhere in the world anything more exquisite, more beautiful, or better ordered or more luxurious, has always found the neat and tidy Chinaman going about with his white clothes on, not able to speak anything but a little pigeon English, and never forgetting to do the bidding of the lady of the house, to carry on all culinary work, all the work of table service, all the work of menial service. Everything of the kind that requires care, and precision, and neatness, and diligence, and faithfulness, the Chinaman was engaged in, and he is engaged in that yet.

The parties in Oregon and California who are unwilling to give up the Chinese laborer to-day are the men who are able to pay a Chinaman $30 to $50 a month for waiting around the house. You can not get an Irishman to do that; you can not get a German to do it. The German or the Irishman has to go out in the field and labor; he must work on the railroad in the hot sun; and he becomes envious and jealous of the high position of the Chinaman who gets $30, $40, or $50 a month for this menial but very pleasant service about the great palatial residences of the nabobs of the Pacific coast.

So the nabobs of the Pacific coast are really at heart against any treaty that keeps the Chinese from coming here, and they have their representatives in the halls of Congress. The great railroad kings and the great money controllers, the men of power and the men of means, have their representatives in Congress.

If you pass over one of the Pacific railroads through Oregon, or California, or Arizona, I think that you can estimate that at least two-thirds of all the laborers engaged in repairing and rebuilding those roads to-day are Chinamen. The companies do not want to give them up. Hence it is now, when modifications are being made in treaties, we never can get any modification that suits those gentlemen. They want to repeal, they say, all treaties with China.

Before I call the attention of the Senate to the progress of treaty-making with the Chinese Empire, I wish to call its further attention to the fact that our annual trade with China of imports is $19,976,789, and that our annual exports amount to $6,248,626. There is over $26,000,000 of annual traffic between the United States and China, the larger part of which comes to the Pacific coast and yields its tribute to our capitalists and our laborers as it passes over the railroads to the Atlantic coast. That, Mr. President, is a very large trade, and it has been increased enormously within a few years past.

A number of gentlemen were invited before the Committee on Foreign Relations, not for the purpose of smothering anything, but for the purpose of getting full and exact information as to what were the needs and wants of the people of the Pacific coast in regard to Chinese immigration and the best methods that were possible to accomplish that by legislation. I think that every member of the House of Representatives from that coast but one, and every Senator from that coast but one—and he was a Democrat—was present at that interview; and in a very able manner and in a very kind way they communicated to that committee what was necessary to be done in the way of legislation to prevent this influx of Chinese into this country.

That was before the treaty which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] says was a fraud and a sham had been negotiated, but it was in process of negotiation, although we did not know it; at least I did not. Those gentlemen communicated to us that they desired that some law should be passed that would absolutely exclude the coming of Chinese laborers here. We called their attention to the phraseology that I have just read in Article VI of the Burlingame treaty which was brought down into the treaty of 1880. We said to them, being a treaty-obeying people, we can not possibly pass a law which will shut out from this country persons who have the right of immigration when we have promised them sacredly in a treaty that they should be put here upon a footing with the people of the most favored nation. We could not do that, and it was a great puzzle and a great embarrassment.

Then it was that some of the distinguished statesmen who were present before the committee insisted that laws should be passed abrogating treaties entirely. The question was put by a member of that committee to those gentlemen, and I think it is in print, "Are you willing to abrogate the treaty by act of law when the result of it will be to take $25,000,000 of trade annually from the United States that is now enjoyed, a larger part of which comes to the Pacific coast?" They announced, some of them, that they were entirely willing to do so.

I thought that the Republican doctrine promulgated by Mr. Seward and Mr. Burlingame had become very unpopular between 1868 and 1887 or 1888, and I wondered in my own mind what was the cause of this great revulsion there. I could not understand why it was that after all the people on the Pacific coast persisted in holding on to their house-servants and body-servants against the tremendous tide of opinion which had so increased in these few years. The Senators and Representatives from there declared that they were willing absolutely to give up every dollar of the trade with China.

It was suggested that uberrima fides on the part of the people on the Pacific coast ought to be the maxim which would justify us on this side of the Rocky Mountains in throwing away a trade of that kind. Whether they were willing to yield their interest in the Chinese trade or not, the people on the east side of the Rocky Mountains might perhaps not be willing to do it, especially when they saw that the division over there was between the sand-lotter and his retainers on one side and the merchant prince or the railroad prince or the vineyard prince on the other side with his retainers.

While we were mooting these questions the present Secretary of State, who enjoys so much of the contempt of the Senator from Oregon, was negotiating a treaty which was afterwards confirmed by the Senate with a few unimportant, inconsequential, unnecessary, and really unmeaning amendments. In the declaration which precedes that treaty, and which I will read, you will find a very strange contrast between the opinions of this Administration and of the Emperor of China at this moment and the declaration which I have just read from Article V and Article VI of the Burlingame treaty. Intermediate, however, between these two treaties was the treaty of 1880. Its Article VI was incorporated literally from the Burlingame treaty, which I will read again:

Citizens of the United States visiting or residing in China shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, or exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation—

That provision stands yet in our favor—

and, reciprocally, Chinese subjects visiting or residing in the United States shall enjoy the same privileges, immunities, and exemptions in respect to travel or residence as may there be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation.

That was carried into the next Republican treaty in 1880. While we were trying to cogitate bills and do something that would not forfeit $25,000,000 a year to gratify some peculiar prejudice represented on this floor to-day by the Senator from Oregon, this Administration was proceeding with a treaty the recital of which is as follows:

Whereas on the 17th day of November, A. D. 1880, a treaty was concluded between the United States and China for the purpose of regulating, limiting, or suspending the coming of Chinese laborers to, and their residence in, the United States; and

Whereas the Government of China, in view of the antagonism and much deprecated and serious disorders to which the presence of Chinese laborers has given rise in certain parts of the United States, desires to prohibit the emigration of such laborers from China to the United States,

That is what the Emperor of China desires.

And whereas the Government of the United States and the Government of China desire to co-operate in prohibiting such emigration, and to strengthen in other ways the bonds of friendship between the two countries:

Now, therefore, the President of the United States has appointed Thomas F. Bayard, Secretary of State of the United States, as his plenipotentiary, and His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of China has appointed Chang Yen Hoon, minister of the third rank of the imperial court, civil president of the board of imperial cavalry, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, as his plenipotentiary; and the said plenipotentiaries, having exhibited their respective full powers found to be in due and good form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that for a period of twenty years, beginning with the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, the coming, except under the conditions hereinafter specified, of Chinese laborers to the United States shall be absolutely prohibited.

The gentlemen who are very high up in grammar, especially in that great and accurate system which finds expression in great statutes and in treaties, thought that they could improve that when it came into the Senate, and they added:

And this prohibition shall extend to the return of Chinese laborers who are not now in the United States, whether holding return certificates under existing laws or not.

The Senate thought that was the proper thing to put in. It certainly was not consulting the Christian spirit of the fifth article of the Burlingame treaty when it put it in, for when a man goes abroad from the United States with a certificate in his pocket that entitles him to return, and that certificate recites that it is in virtue of a treaty with the Government of the United States, it looks to me as if it was at least rather heroic treatment to say to that man, "You shall not come back, notwithstanding you have a certificate." If he was a British subject he would come, because the British Crown could not consent under its constitution to a provision that would take from one of its subjects a right inherent in him and guarantied to him by a foreign government under a treaty.

But a Chinese subject is not a British subject. He is a subject of an absolutely imperial power, and that power had resolved, as is stated in the recitals to this treaty, that in consequence of these disorders, etc., the Emperor of China, the Government of China, desires to prohibit the emigration of such laborers from China to the United States. Therefore, we could afford to put that provision, by way of amendment, into this treaty, for the reason that it executed the purpose which the Chinese Government itself had expressed in its recital, and we did it.

When we came to Article II of the treaty (which I shall not stop to read, for I do not feel quite strong enough to read everything that I should like to read), we appended to the final clause in that article the following words:

And no such Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of customs the return certificate herein required.

That looked to be a little hard. Nobody would ever have thought about that, I think, unless it was some gentleman who had some very decided political interest in tying to himself by hooks of steel somebody or other who had a vote to cast in a ballot-box, who might imagine that that was another proper restriction to put upon a John Chinaman. But we believed, and we yet believe, that the Emperor of China in his desire to prohibit those people from coming here will ratify that part of our action. However, I do not think that Senators have a right to find fault with and to cast slurs upon Secretaries of State, merely because they did not imagine that it was a thing to put in these treaty stipulations.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me just a moment?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator has repeated over and over again that the Senator from Oregon has cast slurs upon the Secretary of State; that he has treated the Secretary with contempt, and other phrases to that effect. Now, I have done nothing of the kind, Mr. President. I have made no unkind allusion even to the honorable Secretary of State, for whom I have the very highest respect. I have said that this treaty, made in entire good faith, I have no doubt, so far as the Secretary of State and the President of the United States are concerned, is in my judgment (which does not amount to very much, I admit) a sham and a fraud in so far as it is a means of accomplishing what was intended by the parties who made it. That was all I said.

Now, one other point. Would it be proper for me to inquire of the Senator from Alabama whether he favored the Senate amendments he has just referred to?

Mr. MORGAN. I voted for them.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, if the Senator has studied the question and understands it, as I take it he has, he must admit that the effect of the first amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and which was adopted by the Senate, will be to exclude from this country at least 36,500 Chinese who would have been permitted to come in under the treaty as sent here by the President of the United States, had it been ratified as signed, without amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator says I must admit it. He draws a logical conclusion of his own from the vote which I gave in this body after I thought I had demonstrated that this amendment was entirely unnecessary. It was not improper, but it was entirely unnecessary. The treaty as it stood excluded them. There was a difference between grammarians about the meaning of words in the treaty, and that was all. I understood it to be a full and complete exclusion of these people. The Senator from Oregon did not understand it in that way, and in order to carry out the wishes of the Emperor of China, as well as of the Democratic President of the United States, I consented that he might have his way, and I assisted him by voting for his proposed amendment. That is the state of the case. Therefore I did not admit any imperfectness at all in the text of this treaty by the vote that I gave—very far from it. I thought I had demonstrated that there was nothing imperfect in it.

There was one other part of this last amendment that I did not like at all. It did not seem to me that any government in the world which had much self-respect would ratify it. It was that no Chinese laborer shall be permitted to enter the United States by land or sea without producing to the proper officer of the customs the certificate therein described. He must bring the very paper. If I had a bill of exchange on the honorable Senator from Oregon for $100,000, we all know that it would be perfectly good. If I should fall into a pond of water somewhere and get it washed up in my pocket so that it was entirely illegible, and I could not produce it, I might not even be able to produce the pulp out of which it had previously been fabricated, yet I could sue him in any court in any Christian country and recover on proof of the existence of the contents and loss of that paper. But if a Chinaman gets to the Seal Islands opposite the Golden Gate with a paper in his pocket, and the ship strikes the island and goes under the water, and the poor fellow is ducked in the sea until his paper is lost, when he gets ashore he must produce the very paper to the custom-house officer or else he must go back to China, although he has our guaranty, our certificate, and has conformed in every particular to our law.

Mr. President, there is such a thing as going to extremity. It is not wisdom, neither can it be called justice. It is a pretty hard strain on words to call it decency. We got very near across the line in yielding to the demand of those gentlemen, who may themselves, as far as we know, have Chinese servants in their own houses, that the Chinaman who carried our certificate out in his pocket in due form and by authority of law must bring the very paper back and present it, or otherwise he is prevented from the privilege of returning to his property, it may be to his family, or whatever he has in the United States.

I have seen some Chinese in the United States for whom I have very great respect; I have seen a great many negroes in the South for whom I have very great respect; but I can not say that I have any respect for the great body of the lower class of Chinese who are brought from Hong Kong here, imported into this country by the Six Companies or by whoever it may be that bring them here.

I do not know that it detracts at all from the Chinaman's respectability that he is a laborer. He may be a laborer in some highly ornamental branch of art. He may be a laborer upon some of the beautiful ceramics that we exhibit with so much pride in our parlors and halls. Nevertheless he is a laborer.

There are honorable men among the Chinese. God would not allow five hundred millions of people to occupy so beautiful a country as that is, and for so many centuries without interruption, unless there was some integrity amongst them. He has never allowed the earth to be cursed in that way by a body of people all of whom are bad and corrupt. So I think we may assume that there are still some honorable Chinese in the world.

I do not want them to come here, because I do not want them to marry our women. I do not want them to incorporate their blood in the Anglo-American veins. I have the same objection to that that I have to miscegenation between negroes and white people. I do not want to increase or encourage the immigration into this country of the lower classes or races of earth, the yellow and the dark men. It does not do any good to them or any good to us. That is my principal objection to their coming here, for in many respects they are very useful people, as we all know. We should have been without many thousand miles of railroad in this country to-day if the Chinese had not come and with their picks and spades helped us to build it. There is no question about that.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me to submit a motion?

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me to make just one more remark I shall then yield.

When a Chinaman who is a laborer comes here with a certificate in his pocket, and he is shipwrecked before he gets ashore, and that certificate was issued by the Government of the United States in good faith, I have thought all the time that we ought at least to leave it to Congress to say whether that man's paper might be substituted by oral proof of its contents when it is lost; but no, it must be put in the body of the irrevocable and supreme statute law—and that was one of my objections to these two amendments—that is, that you put into the body of this supreme law certain specific provisions and details which may be found to be very unjust in their operation, and Congress can not relieve them.

If the Senate will indulge me one moment longer, I do not believe in the doctrine that in the formation of constitutions we should put in those details that belong properly to the legislative power. Put in your principles, your restrictions, your authority, your limits into the bodies of constitutions, and compel your legislators to respect all of this general authority. So in a treaty, the power and function of the legislator should be regarded, and you should not put these specific details in the body of the treaty so as to prevent Congress afterwards from securing justice.

That was the view I took of this treaty. Nevertheless when we put these amendments in, as I am informed, not officially—I speak by general rumor—when we put these details into this treaty and made it as harsh as it is (for it is now a very harsh treaty, reversing absolutely and in every particular the policy with which we set out in the Burlingame treaty), still the Secretary of State went on and executed the will of the Senate in a respect which he thought was unjust; he went on to execute it, and it is on its way now to find ratification, and this eager bid is brought here, I expect the first one that was ever brought into any legislative body in the world, for the purpose of carrying out by Congressional details a treaty that China has not yet ratified.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, as we all know, the Senator from Alabama has been complaining for some time, and unless he desires to be heard further now I ask him to give way for me to make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope the Senator will let us have a vote on the bill. I think we are all in favor of it.

Mr. BECK. We can not have a vote to-night. The Senator from Alabama is not nearly through his speech.

Mr. STEWART. Let us finish it; let us vote.

Mr. BECK. It is now 5 o'clock.

Mr. STEWART. I want to make a few remarks to-night.

Mr. BECK. You can make them to-morrow.

Mr. STEWART. No; I want to make them to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 21, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

Samuel F. Bigelow, of New Jersey, to be United States district attorney for the district of New Jersey.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 20, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRODUCTION OF PRECIOUS METALS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Director of the Mint upon the statistics of the production of precious metals in the United States during the year 1887; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCKENNA, by unanimous consent, offered a resolution to print the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of precious metals in the United States during the year 1887; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

JUDGMENTS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplementary list of judgments of the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

EXPERIMENTS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF SUGAR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Commissioner of Agriculture of an appropriation for experimenting in the manufacture of sugar for the fiscal year 1887–'88; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

CORRECTION OF RECORD.

Mr. SPINOLA. I rise to a privileged question. I ask to have the RECORD corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the correction required.

Mr. SPINOLA. The RECORD reads:

Mr. SPINOLA. I move, on page 32, to strike out lines 86, 87, 88, and 89, as follows: "Pipes, pipe-bowls, and all smokers' articles whatsoever, not specially enumerated or provided for, 50 per cent. ad valorem; all common pipes of clay, 25 per cent. ad valorem."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to going back to that paragraph?

There was no objection.

The question recurred on Mr. SPINOLA's amendment, and it was rejected.

That is an error; the amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER. Was it an amendment to the revenue bill?

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, sir; the amendment was adopted, though it appears by the RECORD as having been rejected.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not here, and it is impossible for the Chair to ascertain whether the RECORD is correct or not. The Chair will cause the bill to be examined, and if there be an error the correction will be made.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

STATE HOMES FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The first question is on the bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of the disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States, with amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is, shall this bill pass?

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ROGERS. Is that one of the bills on which the right to amend was reserved?

The SPEAKER. On this bill the right to amend is reserved.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to know its parliamentary status.

The SPEAKER. It seems that by the unanimous consent of the House in the evening session the previous question was ordered on the passage of the bill, and the right was reserved to offer amendments, as is stated in the Journal.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And the previous question operates on any amendment that may be offered.

Mr. KILGORE. The arrangement made is in the RECORD; I do not know whether the Journal shows it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that all amendments heretofore offered have been agreed to.

Mr. KILGORE. The understanding was that this bill should be reported to the House, and that the right of debate should be reserved as well as the right to amend.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman is in error. The right of debate was not reserved, but the right to amend was reserved. It was so stated, and that fifteen minutes would be allowed for debate.

Mr. KILGORE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KILGORE. The right to amend carries with it, as I understand, the right to debate the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that the right to amend would carry with it the right to debate the amendment unless there was an understanding to the contrary when the previous question was ordered.

Mr. MAISH. The understanding was that the previous question was ordered upon the amendments to be offered as well as upon those already offered.

The SPEAKER. The order made is an unusual one, and somewhat difficult to construe.

Mr. HEARD. I ask that the Journal be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent for the Journal.

Mr. BLAND. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered. Let us have some debate on this matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Consent was given that this bill should come over, and that the previous question should operate not only upon the bill and the amendments offered, but also upon such amendments as might be offered. That having been done by unanimous consent, the motion of the gentleman is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent can have no more effect than a unanimous vote would have.

Mr. BLAND. That arrangement was made last night when there was no quorum here, and it is well enough to have a little debate on this matter.

The SPEAKER. The point of the gentleman from Illinois is not well taken.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND to reconsider, and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 68.

Mr. BLAND. No quorum. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Missouri is filibustering in order to obtain time for debate. Therefore, with a view of coming to an agreement by which time may be saved, I will ask the gentleman how much time he wants for debate?

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] says that the agreement was that there should be time for debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There was no agreement, but I understand that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] was informed by a member of the House that he would be entitled to fifteen minutes for debate. In view of that fact I am perfectly willing that he should have that time.

Mr. LAIRD. That is correct. That was the understanding.

Mr. DOCKERY. I sincerely hope that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] will be allowed fifteen minutes, because he was informed by a member of the House in my presence last night that he would have that time for debate.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Under the circumstances, we are perfectly willing to agree to that.

The SPEAKER. What is the proposition?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] be allowed fifteen minutes in opposition to the bill, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] fifteen minutes in support of it.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion to adjourn pending.

Mr. BLAND. I withdraw that motion, and also the point of "no quorum." All I desired was that there should be time allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that there be thirty minutes allowed for debate, fifteen minutes in support of the bill and fifteen minutes in opposition to it.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to offer an amendment to section 2 of the bill, reducing the amount from $250,000 to $100,000.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 1 of section 2, strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "one hundred."

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, what I desire to say on this bill I can say in connection with this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE].

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say for the information of the House——

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit upon this amendment the observations I have to make upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman will proceed now.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, the amendment just presented affords me an opportunity to express briefly my reasons for opposing the principle of this bill. Its simple purpose is to contribute out of the Treasury of the United States a quarter of a million of dollars to the various State homes for soldiers and sailors who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living, the amount so contributed to be expended under the supervision of the Board of Managers for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

In these "piping times of peace" there is a growing tendency to centralization; and the most efficient and ingenious methods of reaching that point are found in the effort to make the Government of the United States a great eleemosynary institution that it may dispense gifts to the few at the expense of the many, and all in the name of charity, or patriotism, or labor. Such legislation by the Federal Government engenders a spirit of dependence upon the bounty of the Government, a disposition to look to the Federal Government for such things as are usually the result of individual effort, and for that protection which ought to be accorded by the States.

When it is the purpose to plunder the mass for the benefit of a class, an infinite deal of patriotic "gush" is poured out in praise of sweet charity. The rule of all civilized countries whose institutions get their inspiration from the principles of the common law is that the people of each municipal subdivision of the government must care for their own paupers, and it is especially the duty of the people of the States to provide for the indigent residing within the limits of any State. This bill seeks to change that rule by directing the Federal Government to enter into a sort of partnership with the States—that it may share with them the duties and obligations which belong exclusively to the States. It seeks to make further aggressions upon the powers of the States by assuming obligations which rest alone with State governments.

Now, there is a deliberate, settled purpose in the mind of the Republican party to shape the policy of the Federal Government so as to enlarge Federal authority to the detriment of the rights which belong to the States. That this is true does not excite any wonder, for this is the fundamental theory of that party as it was its predecessors. And the Democratic party, believing that the many evils of which the people so justly complain have grown up under the Republican theory of the Government, has ever been found in opposition to such theory. If the Government can do anything it chooses, can exercise any authority which the dominant party may deem to be in the interest of the public, then it may, in fact, take charge of the individual citizen of the States or a limited class of citizens and bestow benefits upon them. It may disregard the aggregate welfare of the masses of the people and devote itself to the interest of the favored few who happen to enjoy the smiles of the party in power.

If it can take care of the indigent of one class it can do so for all classes. If it possesses such authority it can control the education and the appetites, too, of people.

It does not surprise me to find the gentlemen on the other side standing by the principles of their party, but I am astonished to see Democrats contending for the administration of the Government on any such theory.

There is as much Christian charity in the State governments as in the Federal Government, and the States ought to dispense charity to its own people, and thus the burden of caring for those who can not care for themselves is uniformly distributed where it properly belongs, and economy will ever attend expenditures for such purposes when made by the State government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HATCH). Does the gentleman from Texas desire to reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. KILGORE. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] whatever time he may desire to occupy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee will be recognized in the time of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. KILGORE. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. LAIRD objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection; and, there being no further objection, leave was granted.

Mr. ENLOE. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "otherwise," in line 7, insert "except in cases where such disability is the result of the evil and vicious habits of the applicant."

Mr. ENLOE. I wish to state briefly my reason for offering this amendment. The bill provides for admitting to the soldiers' homes in the States, under the regulations prescribed in the bill, soldiers disabled from any cause and incapable of earning a living. This amendment proposes to provide against the admission of those who have not been disabled in the service of the Government, but have been disabled on account of their vices and evil habits contracted since they retired from the service of the country. I do not think the Government is under any obligation to make provision against the consequences of a man's evil habits because he has at one time served the Government. I offer this amendment in order to cover that point. I hope it will be adopted if the bill is to become a law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] yield the remainder of his time?

Mr. KILGORE. I reserve it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] is now recognized for ten minutes.

[Mr. LAIRD withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twelve minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. LAIRD. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will reserve that time.

Mr. LAIRD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA].

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, the merits of the question before the House have been clearly stated by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD]. But the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] has manifested a very extraordinary degree of surprise that any Democrat should favor this measure. If the gentleman from Texas lived in a different clime than that from which he comes, he would readily understand why Northern Democrats should favor a measure of this kind, the effect of which is to reduce taxation upon the people.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPINOLA. Not a minute; not a second of my time.

Mr. KILGORE. Very well.

Mr. SPINOLA. Then, again, sir, the brave men who took the field to save the Union and marched and bivouacked and fought in defense of the flag of our country he brands as "paupers!" I hurl that assertion back into the dirty throat from which it emanated. No man, sir, shall stand upon the floor of this House while I occupy a seat in it and brand the Northern soldiers as paupers without my resenting it; and I am only amazed that an intelligent gentleman, coming from the very southern extreme of our country, should entertain sentiments of that kind against the men who fought and bled to save the Union.

I had a taste of him last night when I appealed to the House in the name of the whole people of this country to yield an appropriation for the erection of a monument in memory of eleven thousand five hundred martyrs who perished in defense of American liberty; and, sir, while the House stood as a unit in support of that measure——

A MEMBER. Eleven thousand five hundred perished?

Mr. SPINOLA. Yes, sir; eleven thousand five hundred on the prison-ships, martyred, suffering, starving, poisoned by representatives of the English Government; and I say, while the House stood as a unit in favor of the measure, the gentleman from Texas raised the question of no quorum, and kept us here until after midnight. If the gentleman supposes for a moment that he is uttering Democratic sentiments by such conduct, I would inform my friend that he is mistaken. Northern Democrats will never hew to that line. [Applause.]

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, as to the proposition that I expressed myself as surprised that any Democrat from the North should favor this measure, the gentleman puts into my mouth words that I never used. What I say is that it is the tendency of the Republican party to enlarge the powers of the Federal Government and to counteract the powers of the State governments; and this measure is in the direct line of that policy. It is the policy of the Democratic party to resist that theory of encroachments inaugurated by the Republican party. It has been the policy of the Democratic party from the foundation of this Government to resist the aggressions made by the party that saw proper to enlarge the powers and duties of the Federal Government at the expense of the States.

As to the offensive personal language used by the gentleman from New York, he is too old a man for me to characterize it in the manner such language deserves——

Mr. SPINOLA. I am young enough to take care of myself.

Mr. KILGORE. I can not reply to such language; but if the gentleman has got any henchman here who will do his bidding in this Hall, and who is willing on his behalf to use that language, then, Mr. Speaker, I will denounce him as a liar on the floor of the House.

He says "he had a taste" of me last night when he appealed to 60,000,000 of people to appropriate a hundred thousand dollars to beautify a park in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y. That "he had a taste" of me when I stood up alone in behalf—I suppose that there are some 5,000,000 of people in New York; how many have you?

Mr. SPINOLA. The State of New York has 6,000,000 of people.

Mr. KILGORE. He stood up in behalf of 6,000,000 of people and demanded that the people of the United States should contribute—the working people, the tax-paying people, the people who furnish the money—to beautify a portion of New York by a monument, and I, in the name of the other 54,000,000 of people in the United States, objected and resisted it.

Mr. DALZELL. Do not speak for Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Nor for Michigan.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I have a very few words to say in reply to the patriotic observations of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPINOLA]. He has put words into my mouth which I never uttered, and then from his own statement he attacks me quite bitterly. He constitutes himself the defender of the Union soldiers when no one has attacked them. In fact the practice of making such attacks lapsed more than twenty years ago. He pours out his indignation on me for opposing this measure, and for referring to the intended beneficiaries under the bill as paupers. I simply deal with them as the bill deals with them. It is intended to include the indigent and none others. It does not propose to provide homes for people who have them—for the rich and poor alike. I did not say a single word calculated to reflect on any soldier, and he knows it full well. No such observation would have been pertinent to the question. I said it was the theory of the Republican party to enlarge the powers and duties and obligations of the Federal Government, and to limit to a corresponding extent the powers and duties of the States, and this measure was in the line of that policy.

Now, with reference to the charge made by the gentleman from New York which called forth the offensive language used by him, I have to say that his age and the respect I have for old men prevent me from denouncing him and his statements as they deserve. But if he has a henchman in this House ready to do his bidding who would make such charge and use such language I will denounce him here or elsewhere as a liar and wholly unworthy of respect. He says he had a taste of me at the session of the House last night, when I stood alone and defeated his bill to appropriate $100,000 to build a monument in Brooklyn.

We did meet last night. He demanded of Congress a hundred thousand dollars of the people's money to beautify a park in Brooklyn. I did not think the people ought to be robbed for any such purpose and resisted his scheme. I did not believe in it and opposed it, and thus gave mortal offense. He demanded it in the name of 6,000,000 people in New York. I opposed it in the name of the other 54,000,000 people of the country at large.

A MEMBER. You do not speak for Pennsylvania and Michigan.

Mr. KILGORE. I have the right and it is my solemn duty to speak for the people who earn their daily bread by their daily labor—I represent just such people—and particularly when I think their money is being squandered by schemes and jobs, I hope to always be found resisting, and the fact that I stood alone in my opposition does not make the slightest difference with me. Now, sir, because I saw proper to speak out for my people who have no interest in building monuments in New York, and who I know do not want their money squandered in any such way, because I saw fit to dissent from the views of the majority of the House I am assailed in the most bitter terms, and under circumstances which preclude any resenting of the offense. The discussion of the question now before the House does not affect the question of parties, it does not affect any soldier or his standing, and so far as I am concerned I did not say a single word calculated to reflect on any soldier.

For myself I can say I was as much opposed to secession and the bringing on of the war as any man in this Chamber, but my first duty was with my people, and I went with them and endeavored to do my whole duty. If there had been no war, there would have been no heroes and no heroic deeds. It produced great men and made the country great. Many men are here now whose distinguished services in the Army inspired the confidence of the people and they promoted them——

Mr. STRUBLE. On your side.

Mr. KILGORE. They are on both sides of this Chamber, and belong to each of the political parties, and many of them fought in each army.

The war is over with me, as are the animosities engendered by that great struggle, and I do not hesitate to say, as an American, that I am proud of the splendid achievements of the Federal Army and of the Confederate army alike, and their glorious deeds, which filled the world with their fame and shed unfading luster on the pages of American history, is the common pride and the common heritage of a great and free people.

Mr. SPINOLA. I used an expression when I addressed the House last which perhaps is unparliamentary, and I desire to withdraw that portion of it in which I said: "I would drive that statement down the dirty throat of the gentleman who uttered it." And I wish to withdraw that remark, which is unparliamentary in my judgment.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Texas is laboring under a delusion in reference to the nature of this bill. I think if he thoroughly understood it he would support instead of antagonizing it. It is a bill in the interest of economy. Under the present law the average cost of the care of disabled soldiers in the National Soldiers' Homes is something over $200 per man. The object of the bill is to encourage——

Mr. STEELE. Where does the gentleman get the authority for making that statement?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand the managers so state.

Mr. LAIRD. It has ranged from $230 down to $140.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, this bill is for the purpose of encouraging the States to build soldiers' homes and take care of the soldiers of the various States who have served in the Army during any war for the Government. This bill offers State homes $100 for each soldier for whom they provide homes. To the extent of $100 on each soldier, therefore, the drain upon the Treasury of the United States is avoided, and the Federal Treasury is relieved of the burden of about $100 on each soldier. The bill, therefore, is in the interest of the tax-payer and in the interest of the National Treasury.

I do not think that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] intended such construction to be placed on his language as has been imputed to it, but the language used by him is calculated to mislead some to imagine that he does not regard it as sound Democratic doctrine to make such legislation as will properly provide for the disabled soldiers of the Republic and which looks to the promotion of the welfare of the laboring classes of this country, which embraces farmers, mechanics, and laborers of all kinds. The history of the Democratic party from its foundation to this day will show that it has been the friend of the soldiery of the Republic and labor. It has ever been faithful to the interests of the loyal soldiers and honest laborers. You will find that in all its platforms it has advocated liberal provision for the disabled soldiers of the Republic, and that no party ever in power, from the revolutionary war down to the last war, has provided such liberal pensions and bounty lands for all the soldiers of the Republic. I say that it has been the policy of the Democratic party and it is in accordance with its principles to provide liberally for every disabled soldier of this Republic, no matter in what war he may have followed the flag.

This bill before the House in its language clearly indicates that the soldiers' homes here recognized are not only intended for relief to the loyal soldiers who fought for the Union in the late war but those who fought for the Republic in all its previous wars.

Mr. STEELE. Will my colleague in his exuberance now yield to me to ask unanimous consent to take up the pension bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I wish it distinctly understood that if the gentleman here wishes to convey the impression that the Democratic party is unfriendly to any class of laborers in this country or any loyal class of soldiers, I deny any such intimation on his part; and, on the contrary, I assert that in its administration it has been the truest, warmest friend of every laboring class in this country and of every loyal soldier of the Republic. It is not only right but it is our solemn duty to promote and guard the interest of these classes wherever and whenever we can properly do so.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Speaker, there are two amendments other than those that were attached to the bill before it was taken up in the House for consideration under this hour, one affecting the qualification of those who seek admission to the homes and the other the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] reducing the appropriation from $250,000 to $100,000. The House might as well understand that, so far as practical results are concerned, it would be just as well to defeat the bill entirely as to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. This is manifest from the fact that some ten States have established homes and are now caring for upwards of forty thousand indigent and disabled soldiers, in which work they have expended some $40,000,000.

As to the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] changing the conditions of admission to the homes, I submit to the House that under this bill the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes of the United States are charged with fixing the conditions upon which the money appropriated by this bill shall be paid out, and that is a sufficient check upon any abuse of the fund. Under the regulations which the board may impose this money will be expended, and the Committee on Military Affairs thought it was wiser to leave the matter in their hands than to attempt to encumber the bill with a mass of detail.

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "otherwise," in line 7, section 1, insert "except in cases where such disability is the result of the evil and vicious habits of the applicant."

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. MAISH. The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] would be to establish different qualifications for admission into State homes from those now existing for the national home. The law as it now exists, and as it applies to the national homes for disabled soldiers, is in the same language as is found in the bill now before the House. I read from the act of 1884:

That all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served in the war of the rebellion, and volunteer soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and of the Mexican war, who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living shall be admitted into the home for disabled volunteer soldiers.

Now, it seems to me that the same disabilities that would admit a soldier into a national home for disabled soldiers ought to entitle him to be admitted to the State homes which it is proposed shall receive aid under the pending bill. That was the reason the language of the act of 1884 was copied in this bill, so that there might be no distinction between the State homes and the national homes.

Mr. ENLOE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The time of debate has expired.

Mr. ENLOE. I should like to have sufficient time to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman require?

Mr. ENLOE. One minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended one minute.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. ENLOE. If this bill passes without the amendment which I have offered, might not a State make a more liberal provision for the admission of persons to these homes and admit a class that might be termed paupers, thereby making an improper charge upon the Treasury of the United States. My object is to keep out such persons as would not be admitted to the national homes for disabled soldiers.

Mr. MAISH. The State homes could admit, and could receive payment from the Government of the United States for, only such soldiers as would come within the regulations established by the Board of Managers.

Mr. LAIRD. The check upon the danger which the gentleman from Tennessee fears is to be found in the provision that the Board of Managers have discretion to make rules to guard against such abuses.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 1, section 2, strike out "two hundred and fifty thousand" and insert "one hundred thousand."

The amendment was rejected, only 10 members voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE].

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "otherwise," in line 7 of section 1, insert "except in cases where such disability is the result of the evil and vicious habits of the applicant."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks——

Mr. HEARD. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The time for debate has expired.

Mr. STEELE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MARTIN] be allowed to address the House.

Mr. HEARD. I object.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAIRD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled the bill (S. 735) making an appropriation for the erection of a light-house on the high land (mainland) westward of Crooked River, Florida; when the Speaker signed the same.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I rise to present a privileged report. I send to the Clerk's desk the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill known as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: Is it in the power of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] to suspend the proceedings of the House on bills upon which the previous question has already been ordered?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House, a conference report can be made even when a motion to adjourn is pending. Such a report has precedence over all other business of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. If my friend from Louisiana will withhold his report for a short time, we can soon dispose of these other bills.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not think it will take very long to dispose of this report; and I think it had better be considered at once.

The Clerk proceeded to read the following report:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17, 18, 20, 27, 39, 64, 65, 82, 94, 99, 101, 111, 112, 115, 119, 120, 121, 122, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 157, 158, 160, 173, 180, 181, 184, 186, 192, 193, 194, 196, 197, 198, 199, 201, 202, 203, 205, 206, 216, 217, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 254.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 37, 40, 41, 42, 46, 47, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 66, 67, 68, 69, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 77, 78, 79, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 95, 96, 97, 98, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 113, 114, 116, 117, 118, 123, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 131, 138, 139, 140, 141, 148, 155, 159, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 171, 172, 174, 175, 177, 178, 179, 182, 185, 187, 191, 195, 207, 208, 209, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 319, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$20,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$35,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$225,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 33: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$25,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 35: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$500,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words added at the end of the paragraph and in lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the amendment insert: "Provided, That no part of the sum shall be expended until the title to the lands forming said islands shall be acquired and vested in the United States, without charge to the latter beyond $300,000 of the sum herein appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$300,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of the amendment proposed: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the expenditure of this appropriation;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 45: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 45, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$180,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendments numbered 48 and 49: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 48 and 49, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out and inserted, amend the paragraph so as to read: "Improving harbor at Tampa Bay, Fla., from outer bar to Mangrove or Busby Point;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$25,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 70: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 70, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of the matter proposed to be inserted the words "if approved by the Secretary of War;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 75: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 75, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$35,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 80: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 80, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$50,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 93: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 93, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$300,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 100: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 100, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted, substitute and add after line 13, page 24, of the bill, the following: "The Secretary of War is authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineer officers of the United States Army, whose duty it shall be to thoroughly examine the Ohio River below Pittsburgh as to the practicability of the improvement of the navigation of said river by means of movable dams; and said board shall report on or before the first Monday of December next as to the feasibility and advisability of such project of improvement, the number of dams required, their location, with the cost of same, together with the cost of maintaining them after completion of the project. The Secretary of War shall transmit said report to Congress at its next session, together with the views of himself and the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army thereon. The sum of $10,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay expenses of said board and survey;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 130: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 130, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add to the words proposed to be inserted the words "including the channel over the bar at the mouth;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 132: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 132, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$175,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 169: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 169, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out the semicolon after the word river in line 2, page 35 of the bill, and insert a comma. Strike out the word "also" in the first line of the matter to be inserted. Strike out the semicolon at the end of the matter proposed to be inserted, and insert a comma. Strike out the word "also" in line 2, page 35 of the bill, and insert the word "and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 183: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 183, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add at the end of said amendment the words "by the river and harbor act approved August 5, 1886, for the examination of said canal and of the Illinois and Michigan Canal, by a board of engineers;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 188: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 118, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out, and amend by striking out the words "and fifty," in line 24 of page 4 of the bill; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 189: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 189, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$200,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 190: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 190, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Strike out the period after the word "navigation," in line 22, page 42 of the bill, and insert a semicolon; and in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted in said amendment insert "and $50,000 of said sum, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be expended in improving and strengthening Luy Island Levee, where it crosses Surcarte Slough and other sloughs, and in repairing wash-outs in said levee;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 200: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 200, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out and add, after line 4, page 4 of the bill, "at Helena, Ark., $75,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 204: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 204, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter stricken out, with an amendment changing the sum appropriated to $250,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 210: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 210, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,000,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 231: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 231, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out insert under surveys, after line 8, page 53 of the bill, the following: "The Secretary of War is hereby directed to make an examination and report to Congress as to the necessity for the establishment and maintenance of public moorings for the protection of shipping in the open and exposed ports on the northern coast of California at Fort Ross, Fish's Mill, Fish Rock, Shelter Cove, Trinidad, and such other places as may be deemed advisable by him;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 318: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 318, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Amend the paragraph so as to read, "For a survey of Minnesota Point, at Superior, at the west end of Lake Superior, to ascertain what, if anything, should be done to preserve the same from the inroads of the Lake, and for the protection of the harbor, together with the cost thereof;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 320: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 320, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add the following proviso after the word "engineer" in line 26, page 62 of the bill: "And provided further, That the Government shall not be deemed to have entered upon any project for the construction or improvement of any water way, harbor, or canal mentioned in this bill unless or until the work of construction shall have been actually appropriated for;" and the Senate agree to the same.

NEWTON C. BLANCHARD,
THOS. J. HENDERSON,
T. C. CATCHINGS,
Managers on the part of the House.
WM. P. FRYE,
J. N. DOLPH,
M. W. RANSOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN (after the reading of the report had begun) said: Inasmuch as the reference to amendments by numbers gives no information to the House, I suggest that the reading of this report be omitted and the statement of the House conferees read instead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asks unanimous consent that the formal report, which merely refers to the amendments by numbers, be printed in the RECORD without reading, and that the statement of the House conferees showing the effect of the amendments be read instead. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Can we not still further economize time by allowing the gentleman from Louisiana to make a statement without having any document read? I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the written statement be dispensed with, and the gentleman from Louisiana be permitted to make an explanation.

Mr. WEAVER. This is a very important bill——

Mr. SOWDEN. Let us have the report read.

The following statement of the House conferees, submitted in accordance with the rule, was read:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9859), known as "the river and harbor bill," submit the following statement:

The Senate amendments to the bill were three hundred and twenty in number.

Of these one hundred and seventeen were merely verbal amendments in the sense that they neither increased nor decreased the aggregate of the bill, sixty-nine were orders of survey added by the Senate, forty-three were reductions in amounts as allowed by the bill as it passed the House, and ninety-one were increases in amounts as fixed by the House bill, or additions to the bill.

The bill as it passed the House appropriated the sum of $19,902,783.13.

As agreed upon in conference it aggregates $22,277,116.90, being a net increase of $2,374,333.77.

This increase consists principally of the following items:

Potomac River at Washington	$300,000
Harbor of Philadelphia	293,000
Harbor of Baltimore	50,000
Harbor of Savannah	50,000
Harbor of Oakland, Cal	1[illegible]
Gowanus Bay, Harbor of New York	[illegible]
Breakwater at Mount Desert, Me	[illegible]
Harbor of Charlotte, N. Y	[illegible]
Harbor at Yaquina Bay, Oregon	[illegible]
Harbor of Buffalo, N. Y	[illegible]
Missouri River	[illegible]
Cape Fear River	[illegible]
Columbia River at the Cascades	[illegible]
Kennebec River	[illegible]
Great Kanawha River	[illegible]
Thames River, Connecticut	[illegible]
Penobscot River	[illegible]
Housatonic River	[illegible]
Roanoke River, North Carolina	[illegible]
St. Clair Flats Ship-canal	[illegible]
Lower Willamette River	[illegible]
Green and Barren Rivers	[illegible]
Mississippi River between the Des Moines Rapids and mouth of Illinois	50,000
Harbor of Norwalk, Conn	25,000
Harbor of Oconto, Wis	18,000
Harbor of Helena, Ark	75,000
White River, Arkansas	17,000
St. John's River, Florida	55,000
For examinations, surveys, etc	75,000

All the Senate's reductions of the amounts as fixed by the House were restored except five, and these five aggregated $15,500.

The Senate receded from its amendment striking out the appropriation for the purchase of the lock and dam on the Monongahela River.

The Senate amendment for the purchase of the improvement known as the Green and Barren Rivers improvement was agreed to.

There is no appropriation in the bill for any canal project.

The Senate receded from its amendment providing for the purchase of the Portage Lake Canal and the Lake Superior Ship-Canal, Railway and Iron Company Canal.

The Senate amendment for a survey of a canal from Lake Michigan to the Illinois and Desplaines Rivers was agreed to.

Also, the Senate amendment providing for a survey and location of a canal from the Illinois River, at or near the town of Hennepin, to the Mississippi River.

Also, the Senate amendment for a survey of a canal connecting the waters of Lake Michigan with the Calumet River.

But the Government is not to be deemed committed to these projects, nor indeed to any other project for which a survey is ordered in this bill, as will be seen by the following clause added to that section of the bill, making an appropriation for examinations, surveys, contingencies, etc., namely:

"And provided further, That the Government shall not be deemed to have entered upon any project for the construction or improvement of any water way, harbor, or canal mentioned in this bill, unless or until the work of construction shall have been actually appropriated for."

The last river and harbor bill to become a law was that approved August 5, 1886, and covered appropriations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887.

Two years have elapsed without a river and harbor bill.

The present bill, therefore, really carries appropriations for two years, namely, the fiscal year ended June 30, 1888, and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, making the amount for each year a little over $11,000,000.

NEWTON C. BLANCHARD,
T. C. CATCHINGS,
THOS. J. HENDERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. WISE. I wish to ask the gentleman what has been the action of the conferees in regard to the amendment of the Senate striking out the appropriation for Norfolk Harbor, Virginia.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Senate receded from its amendment striking out that appropriation.

Mr. WISE. That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] demands the previous question.

Mr. SOWDEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, if there is no debate before the previous question is ordered, there will be thirty minutes allowed for debate afterward. But if the report is debated before the previous question is ordered there will be no subsequent debate.

Mr. SOWDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana a question.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will be glad to answer any question propounded by any gentleman.

Mr. SOWDEN. I would like the gentleman to state to the House the amount of the aggregate appropriations for all purposes contained in this bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Twenty-two million two hundred and seventy thousand dollars. I will add that this is for two fiscal years, as we have not had a river and harbor bill passed for two years.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. What about the canal schemes put in the bill by the Senate?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] asks what has become of the canal schemes which were added to the bill by the Senate. I will state that there is now no appropriation in the bill for any canal project. The Senate put on an appropriation for the purchase of the Portage Lake Canal, but receded in conference from that amendment, and it goes out of the bill. The Senate also put on an amendment providing for the survey of what is known as the Hennepin Canal, the Lake Michigan and Illinois River Canal, and for a canal to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with the Calumet River. The House conferees agreed to those amendments, since they provided only for surveys, but did so with an amendment adding a clause which provides that the Government is not to be deemed committed to any of these canal projects.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question upon agreeing to the report

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER (having put the question on agreeing to the report). The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SOWDEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 26, noes 110 (less than one-fifth voting in the affirmative).

Mr. BLAND. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays. I think this bill ought not to pass without our having a record upon it.

Tellers were not ordered, only 19 voting in favor thereof.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are refused, and the yeas and nays are refused.

Mr. WEAVER. I call for a division on the question of agreeing to the report.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 114, noes 14.

Mr. WEAVER. No quorum.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WEAVER and Mr. BLANCHARD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 154, noes 44.

Mr. WEAVER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEAVER. Other business having intervened, is it not now in order to demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of this report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the only way to reach that result would be to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. WEAVER. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. BAYNE. And I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. WEAVER. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 29 in favor of the demand and 114 opposed to it—the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed with amendments House bills of the following titles in which concurrence was requested, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1426) supplementary to the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and also of the act of July 2, 1864, and other acts amendatory of said first-named act;

A bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannock Indians, for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation, in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia, for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape; and

A bill (H. R. 10573) to provide for one additional associate justice of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes.

It further announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. 331) for the relief of David Meriweather, and agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. SPOONER, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas, conferees on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate had passed the joint resolution (H. Res. 103) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts and officials to the city of Utica, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 3008) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury; and

A bill (H. R. 8183) for the erection of a public building at Opelousas, La.

Also, that the Senate, in compliance with the request of the House, returned the bill (H. R. 10356) granting a pension to J. T. Vincent.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills and resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 1951) to prohibit members of Territorial Legislatures holding certain offices;

A bill (S. 2384) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Loren W. Hastings;

A bill (S. 2539) to authorize and direct the purchase of a part of a lot adjoining the Senate stables for their ventilation, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 2742) to incorporate the Brightwood Railway Company of the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. 3058) relieving the municipalities in the Territories in certain cases;

A bill (S. 3303) amendatory of "An act relating to postal crimes, and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned," approved June 18, 1888;

Concurrent resolution to provide for the printing of the eighth and ninth annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology; and Concurrent resolution to authorize the printing of additional copies of the eighth and ninth annual reports of the Director of the United States Geological Survey.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would suggest, as a compromise, that the yeas and nays be taken on the adoption of the report of the conference committee instead of on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. SOWDEN. Regular order.

Mr. BLAND. You had better accept that.

Mr. BAYNE. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman may as well agree to that, for I give notice that you will have to do it before you get this report through.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think, Mr. Speaker, there will be no objection to taking the vote directly upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAYNE and others demanded the regular order.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. Go on with the roll-call.

Mr. DUNN. This is not a vote on the passage of the bill, but on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. HOPKINS, of New York. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. There will be no objection, I am sure, to taking the vote on the main question instead of on this motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. But several members have demanded the regular order.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. Why is it that when $22,000,000 of the people's money is involved in a question the privilege of a yea-and-nay vote is refused?

Mr. SOWDEN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman does not submit a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WISE. What is the pending question?

The SPEAKER. On the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused.

Upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. WEAVER. Our vote is "no."

Mr. BLANCHARD. Our vote is "ay." [Laughter.]

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 74, not voting 78; as follows:

So the motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BLANCHARD, by unanimous consent, the reading of the names of members voting was dispensed with.

The following-named members were announced as paired for the day:

Mr. DINGLEY with Mr. WILKINS.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. PARKER.

Mr. TAULBEE with Mr. SPOONER.

Mr. COCKRAN with Mr. BROWER.

Mr. RUSK with Mr. STRUBLE.

Mr. LAWLER with Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOGG with Mr. BINGHAM.

The following were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. MCKINNEY with Mr. BUCHANAN.

Mr. RAYNER with Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois.

The following were announced as paired until Saturday:

Mr. OUTHWAITE with Mr. SYMES.

Mr. HARE with Mr. NELSON.

The following were announced as paired until further notice:

Mr. GREENMAN with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL with Mr. BELDEN, from June 16.

Mr. PENINGTON with Mr. WHITING, of Michigan, from this day, July 12, 1888.

Mr. PERRY with Mr. HAYDEN.

Mr. BRIGGS with Mr. FELTON.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. CATCHINGS with Mr. COGSWELL.

Mr. COLLINS with Mr. DUNHAM.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. WILKINS. I desire to withdraw my vote, as I am paired.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused has been laid upon the table. The tellers report ayes 154, noes 44. So the report of the conference committee is agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GLASS, for to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, for ten days, from Monday, July 23, on account of important business.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BYNUM. I notice in the RECORD of this morning a statement that I am paired with Mr. HOGG. I was not paired with that gentleman; and I notice Mr. HOGG is paired on the list of the Sergeant-at-Arms with Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

WILLIAM F. SMITH.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 396) for the relief of General William F. Smith.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL W. W. AVERELL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the next bill.

The Clerk read the title of the next bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 1650) for the relief of Maj. Gen. W. W. Averell.

Mr. STEELE. The right to offer amendments was reserved on this bill, and I move to strike out the word "captain" and insert the word "major."

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, General Averell is willing to accept the rank of captain and I think we had better accept that and not send the bill back with an amendment. I have his letter saying that he would be satisfied with that rank.

The question was put; and there were—yeas 39, noes 44.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WISE. Is it in order to call for the reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate and it can be read only by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] asks unanimous consent for the reading of the bill. Is there objection?

Several members objected.

Mr. WISE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 91, noes 21.

Mr. COWLES. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum is made.

Mr. WISE. I will say to the House if unanimous consent to the yeas and nays be given there will be no objection. The point of "no quorum" will not be made. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BLAND. Is it in order to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were refused? If it is I move to reconsider that vote.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I find by looking at the RECORD that a number of members were absent last night when the bill was considsidered, and I would like to have the bill read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Bvt. Maj.

Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, before and during the late war, and of severe wounds received by him in battle, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William W. Averell, brevet major-general United States Army and late brigadier-general United States Volunteers, to the position of captain in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired-list of the Army of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said William W. Averell, nor shall any compensation be paid to him for any period prior to his appointment under this act; but this proviso shall be no bar to any claims for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of the said William W. Averell may have after his decease.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 143, nays 74, not voting 107; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Speaker, when the roll was called I voted, having forgotten that I was paired with Mr. HARE, of Texas. I withdraw my vote.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois, with Mr. RAYNER, on this vote.

Mr. HARE with Mr. NELSON, for the remainder of the day.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MAISH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ANDREW J. SMITH.

Mr. MAISH. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late a colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the laws regulating appointments in the Army be, and they are hereby, suspended, and suspended only for the purposes of this act; and the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers, a brigadier-general in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him, the said Andrew J. Smith, upon the retired-list of the Army as such brigadier-general without regard and in addition to the number now authorized by law of said retired-list.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11, strike out the words "as such brigadier-general" and insert "with the rank and grade of colonel."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, many of us were absent last evening, and I desire to ask a question for information. I wish to know whether this soldier left the Army voluntarily.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give consent to have the report read, it will give the desired information. The report consists of a letter from the Adjutant-General of the Army and a letter from General Sherman.

Mr. MAISH. The gentleman can probably state the substance of it in less time than it would take to read the report.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order, the previous question having been ordered. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] asks unanimous consent to have the report in this case read.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I was under the impression that there was an understanding that a certain time was to be allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. It seems not, from the Journal.

Mr. CHEADLE. There was to be the right to amend, and the right to debate also.

The SPEAKER. The right to amend was reserved, but the right to debate seems not to have been reserved. Of course the Chair knows only what the record shows.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The bill is open to amendment.

"Old A. J. Smith," as he is familiarly called by the soldiers who braved many a hard-fought field under his gallant leadership, belongs to the city I in part represent here. He is loved by all our people, who admire his character as a soldier and a citizen. I but voice their unanimous sentiment in asking for the passage of this bill. In the committee's report is a letter from General Sherman in regard to this bill. His concluding remarks epitomize the whole story:

I believe a million of men would sign a petition that this now old, but most honest, faithful, uncomplaining soldier and gentleman, General Andrew J. Smith, should be restored to his old place on the Army Register, and retired with any rank Congress may think appropriate. He was a corps commander, which the world over is that of lieutenant-general, but I am told he will be satisfied with that of brigadier-general. I surely recommend it.

Yours, very truly,

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Mr. CLARDY. There was no more gallant, no more brilliant officer in the American Army than General Andrew J. Smith, who, becoming a soldier in 1838, continued in his country's service until 1869, when an act of Congress having passed reducing the number of colonels and lieutenant-colonels from forty-five in each grade to twenty-five, he performed one of the most graceful, one of the most heroic, one of the most chivalric acts of his eventful life in resigning his commission as colonel of the Seventh Cavalry to make room for a younger man.

If a long and meritorious service in the Army entitles a soldier to the recognition sought for General Smith there can be no question as to the merit of the pending bill, and I shall vote for it with pleasure increased by the act of self-abnegation that took him out of the Army.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Andrew J. Smith as a soldier is well known to the entire country. Nothing that can be said in this report can add to his distinguished name. He is now over seventy-three years of age. His military service is given in the following communication from the Adjutant-General, United States Army:

"WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington, February 8, 1886.

"Statement of the military service of Andrew J. Smith, late of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office.

"He was graduated at the United States Military Academy at the age of twenty-three years and two months, and was appointed second lieutenant First Dragoons July 1, 1838; was promoted first lieutenant March 4, 1845; captain, February 16, 1847; major, May 13, 1851, and lieutenant-colonel Fifth Cavalry May 9, 1864; appointed colonel Seventh Cavalry July 28, 1866.

"He was mustered in as colonel Second California Cavalry October 2, 1861, and resigned November 13, 1861.

"He was appointed brigadier-general United States Volunteers March 17, 1862, and major-general United States Volunteers May 12, 1864.

"He received the brevet of colonel United States Army April 10, 1864, 'for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Pleasant Hill, La.;' of brigadier-general United States Army March 13, 1865, 'for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Tupelo, Miss.;' and of major-general United States Army March 13, 1865, 'for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Nashville, Tenn.'

"He served with his regiment on the Western frontier and Pacific coast, excepting short intervals of detached duty and leaves of absence, from 1838 to 1861; with the Second California Cavalry October 2, 1861, to November 13, 1861, when he resigned and was ordered to report to the Adjutant-General United States Army under his commission as major Fifth United States Cavalry.

"He served as chief of cavalry, Department of the Missouri, from February 11 to March 11, 1862, and of the Department of the Mississippi to July 11, 1862, being engaged in the advance upon and siege of Corinth, April 15 to May 30, 1862; commanding troops at Covington, Ky., and vicinity, September 9 to October 9, 1862; commanding Tenth Division, Thirteenth Army Corps, in movements through Kentucky, October to November, 1862; at Memphis, Tenn., November 28 to December 21, 1862; on expedition with General Grant's Army to the Yazoo River, Mississippi, December, 1862, being engaged in the assault of Chickasaw Bluffs, December 27–29, 1862, and on the expedition to Arkansas Post to January 11, 1863; in the Vicksburg campaign and operations against Jackson, Miss., to August 5, 1863; commanding the Sixth Division, Sixteenth Army Corps, and district of Columbus, Ky., to January 21, 1864, and Third Division, Sixteenth Army Corps, to March 6, 1864; commanding detachments (two divisions) Sixteenth and Seventeenth Army Corps in the Red River campaign to May 22, 1864; commanding right wing Sixteenth Army Corps in Mississippi and Tennessee to September, 1864, and in the pursuit of the rebel General Price in Missouri to November, 1864; commanding detachment of the Army of the Tennessee to February, 1865, participating in the operations about Nashville, Tenn., under Major-General Thomas; commanding Sixteenth Army Corps (in the Mobile campaign and siege of Spanish Fort, Alabama) to August 8, 1865; district of Montgomery, Ala., to October 25, 1865, and district of Western Louisiana until honorably mustered out of the volunteer service, January 15, 1866; on leave of absence and permission to delay joining his command (Seventh United States Cavalry) to November 26, 1866; commanding regiment and district of Upper Arkansas, at Forts Riley and Harker, Kans., to September 15, 1867; commanding Department of the Missouri to March 2, 1868; on leave to May 6, 1869, when he resigned.

"R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General."

It will be seen that at the date of his resignation (May 6, 1869) he had served thirty years and ten months.

On the 15th of July, 1870, the law was amended, providing that—

"Where an officer has been thirty years in the service, he may, upon his own application, in the discretion of the President, be so retired and placed on the retired-list." (Sec. 1243.)

Had General Smith remained in the Army until the passage of that law he would have served over thirty-two years and could have been placed upon the retired-list on his own application.

At the time of his resignation an act of Congress reduced the Army from 45 colonels and 45 lieutenant-colonels to 25 colonels and 25 lieutenant-colonels.

"It was the most ungrateful task imposed upon us by Congress," writes General W. T. Sherman. Then it was that General A. J. Smith, with a soldier's generosity, to make way for younger men, resigned as colonel of the Seventh Cavalry.

The following letter from General W. T. Sherman needs no explanation:

"ST. LOUIS, MO., March 3, 1886.

"DEAR WARNER: Having been requested to bear testimony as to the value of the service rendered to the Government by General Andrew J. Smith, now a citizen of St. Louis, I beg to state that I have had special opportunities to observe his conduct during the past fifty years. He was a cadet at West Point when I went there in 1836. He graduated in 1838 and went to the frontier, where he served till the Mexican war, 1846, when he came out to California with Cooke's battalion and continued there and in Oregon up to the civil war, which he was quick to enter, and came to us at Shiloh in April, 1862, as a brigadier-general of volunteers, and marched with us to Corinth, from which time to the end of the war he was one of the pluckiest and best fighters of our Western Army.

"For details I refer to Cullum's Register (vol. I, pages 566 and 567). Not a soldier of the Western Army but remembers 'Old A. J.' He was with me at Chickasaw and Vicksburg on my Meridian march, and was afterwards sent by me in command of the two divisions detached to General Banks up Red River. His conduct there is described as peculiarly brilliant. After coming out of Red River he was sent to Tupelo, Miss., where he fairly defeated Forrest, and then was called to Missouri to drive Price out of the State, immediately after which he hastened to Nashville, where he gave material help to General Thomas in the great victory of Nashville. Without rest he was sent to Mobile, which he assisted to capture, and at the end of the war was found at Montgomery, Ala. His service in the civil war was simply invaluable, and can not be measured by dollars and cents.

"As soon as the war was over he returned to his rank in the regular Army as colonel of the Seventh Cavalry, on the plains, fighting the Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and Kiowas, to clear the way for the Kansas Pacific Railroad.

"I do not remember that General Smith ever lost a day in the field from sickness; and in California, in Oregon, on the plains, and throughout the civil war he had the reputation of being the hardest worker and hardest fighter in the Army.

"I believe a million of men would sign a petition that this now old, but most honest, faithful, uncomplaining soldier and gentleman should be restored to his old place on the Army Register, and retired with any rank Congress may think appropriate. He was a corps commander, which the world over is that of lieutenant-general, but I am told he will be satisfied with that of brigadier-general. I surely recommend it.

"Yours, very truly,

"W. T. SHERMAN, General.

"Hon. WILLIAM WARNER,
"Member of Congress, of Missouri, Washington, D. C."

Your committee report the bill back, with the recommendation that the same do pass with the following amendment, namely:

To strike out in line 11 the words "as such brigadier-general" and insert the following words in lieu thereof: "With the rank and grade of colonel."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLAND. On that I demand the yeas and nays. I think this is a bill of the kind on which we ought to make a record.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 65, not voting 141; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, with Mr. BURNETT, on all political questions for the rest of the day.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. MILLIKEN, on all political questions for the rest of the day.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, with Mr. KETCHAM, on all political questions for the rest of the day.

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, on all political questions for the rest of the day.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, with Mr. TURNER, of Georgia, on this vote.

Mr. REED with Mr. STEELE, on this bill.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. GEAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LANHAM. Before moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent that the rest of this day be devoted to the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims to which there may be no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Pending that proposition, I move that the House adjourn. I think that after our long session of last night, if we now adjourn we shall be fresher for to-morrow.

The motion of Mr. BLAND was not agreed to, there being ayes 1, noes 59.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the remainder of this day be devoted to the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims to which there may be no objection.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I object.

Mr. LANHAM. I will renew the request with this addition—that next Friday be devoted to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on War Claims to which there may be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] now accompanies his previous request with the further request that next Friday be devoted to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on War Claims to which there is no objection. Is there objection to these two requests?

Mr. MATSON. If the proposed order includes the whole of this legislative day, it would interfere with the regular order of the Friday evening session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand the proposition.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, and Mr. O'FERRALL objected.

Mr. LANHAM. I move to dispense with the call of committees for to-day, the usual leave being granted to file reports with the Clerk.

There being no objection the motion was agreed to, and leave granted as requested.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

RICHARD JOBES.

Mr. FRENCH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8748) to increase the pension of Richard Jobes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

RICHARD D. M'KINNEY.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 752) granting a pension to Richard D. McKinney; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DANIEL TANNER.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4649) granting a pension to Daniel Tanner; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. JANE POTTS.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 525) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Potts; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LYDIA ANN WILBER.

Mr. LANE also, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 8200) granting a pension to Lydia Ann Wilber; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH HOLMES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 9388) granting a pension to Joseph Holmes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONDEMNATION OF LAND ON ROCK CREEK, ETC.

Mr. ROWELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3328) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to condemn land on Rock Creek for the purposes of a park to be called Rock Creek Park; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE AT HOLLAND'S ISLAND BAR, MARYLAND.

Mr. THOMAS H. B. BROWNE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2398) to provide for a light-house at Holland's Island Bar, near the entrance to Kedge's Straits, in the Chesapeake Bay, Maryland; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COL. JAMES C. DUANE.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 45) for the relief of Col. James C. Duane; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JULIA A. THOMAS.

Mr. STOCKDALE, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably a resolution for the relief of Julia A. Thomas, administratrix to I. S. O. G. Greer, deceased; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

M. C. MORDECAI.

Mr. SHAW, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1521) for the relief of M. C. Mordecai; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that on Saturday, the 28th instant, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the Committee on Printing be allowed one hour in which to present for consideration measures reported by them. These matters involve simply printing for the two Houses of Congress, which is not privileged, and can only be considered under some such order as that now proposed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks unanimous consent that on Saturday, the 28th instant, immediately after the reading of the Journal, one hour be set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Printing not of a privileged character. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS. There is a general expectation on this side of the House that the Committee on Rules will report a resolution fixing time for all of these committees, and until that is done I shall feel called upon to object.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9872) for the relief of Perez Dickinson.

Mr. LANHAM. I think when the committee last rose that we had under consideration the bill (H. R. 53) for the relief of Samuel Noble, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COMPTON. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COMPTON. It is, sir, that the bill to be first considered at this time is the bill H. R. 6347; and if allowed to do so, I would like to state the grounds upon which I base the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. COMPTON. On the 16th of March last the bill to which I have referred was under consideration in the House. It is a bill reported from the Court of Claims which went through the usual channel of the Committee on War Claims, and was reported to the House. Under the provisions of the Bowman act and the decisions of the Speaker of this House, this bill, coming over from the Forty-ninth Congress, had preference on the Calendar. This will be discovered by reference to page 103 of the Journal of the present House, where the point was made by my colleague from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], and the Speaker ruled that such bills had preference on the Calendar.

On the 16th of March, sir, this bill was being considered and was referred back by the Committee of the Whole to the House, and subsequently to the Committee on War Claims. The point was made then that the bill, when it came back to the House from the Committee on War Claims would not take its place on the Calendar, and the then occupant of the chair so maintained. I stated at that time distinctly that I would consent to the reference of the bill to the Committee on War Claims, accepting the motion made by a gentleman from Ohio to that effect, and would take my chance when this bill came back from the committee of securing its proper place on the Calendar.

That bill has been reported back from the Committee on War Claims. My point now is that under the ruling of the Chair, and in view of the provisions of the Bowman act, the bill necessarily takes its place at the head of the Calendar by reason of the preference given it by that act, and hence is the first bill for consideration to-day.

Mr. LANHAM. The bill to which the gentleman from Maryland refers was discussed and considered at some length in Committee of the Whole, and my recollection is that it was referred to the Committee on War Claims after considerable discussion.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I will suggest that a reference to the RECORD will show what was done on that occasion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I raise the point of order that on Thursday evening last the House was in session under a special order of the House for consideration of pension bills, and adjourned because of the want of a quorum. My point is that they have precedence under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. They would have when the committee rises and goes back into the House; but the consideration has been completed in Committee of the Whole.

The Chair will direct——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Chair then holds, I understand, that when we go into the House these bills will have precedence.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I suggest that an understanding should be reached in reference to that matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that its opinion was simply in the nature of information. Of course the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole can not make a ruling upon a question which is to govern the House.

Mr. COMPTON. Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Maryland will allow the Chair to learn from the Clerk the exact status of the bill to which he has referred, it will expedite the consideration of the point he makes. The Chair is endeavoring to ascertain the facts.

Mr. OATES. When the House was last in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar the committee rose during the consideration of a bill for the relief of Samuel Noble at the point where the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] demanded to be heard, and we did not have sufficient time to allow him to proceed with the debate. The committee then rose, and under the circumstances I insist that the bill is first in order.

Mr. COMPTON. As the unfinished business?

Mr. LANHAM. My recollection is exactly in accord with that of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. COMPTON. I withdraw my point of order in view of the statement of the gentleman from Alabama and agree that the unfinished business may be considered, but reserving the right to make the point of order when it is concluded.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill to which the gentleman from Alabama refers appears on the Calendar as the sixth bill.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. When we were last considering these bills a number were passed over because the persons interested in their consideration were not present, and the Samuel Noble bill was reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to take the Calendar in the order in which the bills appear upon it.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. In calling attention to the fact that this was unfinished business, my idea is that after the completion of it we then go back and take up the Calendar in its order.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that order will be pursued, and the Clerk will report the bill to which the gentleman from Alabama has called attention.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Samuel Noble, formerly of Rome, Ga., but now a citizen of Anniston, in the State of Alabama, may, notwithstanding the decision heretofore made, and the law of the statute by lapse of time, prosecute his claim to the net proceeds of sale of 802 bales of cotton, alleged to have been captured by the United States military authorities at Savannah, Ga., in December, 1864, before the Court of Claims, under the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned or captured property and the prevention of frauds in the insurrectionary districts of the United States," approved March 12, 1863, and this act.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

"That Samuel Noble, a citizen of the State of Alabama, may, notwithstanding the bar of the statute of limitation, or other legal impediment hitherto existing, prosecute his claim to the net proceeds of the sale of 802 bales of cotton, alleged to have been captured by the United States military authorities at Savannah, Ga., in December, 1864, before the Court of Claims, under the provisions of this act and 'An act to provide for the collection of abandoned or captured property, and the prevention of frauds in the insurrectionary districts of the United States,' approved March 12, 1863."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that there seems to be not only a committee amendment but also two other amendments. Both amendments can not be entertained at one and the same time. The Clerk will read the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to line 14, page 2, the words "but no judgment shall pass in favor of said Samuel Noble until his loyalty during the late war shall have been established to the satisfaction of said court; and he shall further prove that during said war he did not in any way afford aid and comfort to the late rebellion."

Mr. OATES. I do not wish to address the committee, but will give my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY], who presented the minority report and who was absent at the time the bill was considered.

Mr. SENEY. Mr. Chairman, is it in order to discuss the merits of the original bill as well as the pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. It is, and the gentleman will be recognized for one hour.

Mr. SENEY. This claim of Samuel Noble is not a new one. The report of the majority of the Judiciary Committee tells us that it has been considered by Congressional committees at different times for the last twelve years. In the RECORD of June 16, 1888, may be found the minority report. A similar report was made by me from the Committee on the Judiciary in the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses.

The minority report starts out with the statement that Samuel Noble was in 1865, and for ten years prior thereto, a loyal citizen of the United States, and a resident of the city of Rome, in the State of Georgia.

I can not say, Mr. Chairman, at this time what facts were before me five years ago when I wrote the first minority report. I think it is more than probable that, so far as the loyalty of this gentleman is concerned, I assumed that to be so on the strength of certain statements contained in the papers that were before the committee when it was considering this claim. I am not prepared at this time to question his loyalty. It is asserted by my friend from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that during the entire rebellion period he was a loyal citizen of the United States. I know of no satisfactory evidence proving or disproving the truth of my friend's assertion.

In order that the House may have a correct understanding of this claim I will state that this claimant, Samuel Noble, some time in the year 1864 entered into a contract with the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the then President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln, by which he undertook to deliver to the United States Government, at various points in the insurrectionary districts of the South, 250,000 bales of cotton.

A copy of the contract referred to is found in volume 11, page 600, Court of Claims Reports. The contract shows that Mr. Noble represented to the Treasury Department, and no doubt to the President of the United States, that he was the owner of 7,000 or 8,000 bales of cotton. Mr. Noble also represented that 800 of these bales were in Selma, Ala.; 1,256 in Mobile, Ala.; 200 in Rome, Ga.; 1,800 in Savannah, Ga., and between 4,000 and 5,000 in and about the city of Augusta, Ga.

The House will notice that this contract is one of no mean proportions. It was proposed by this man to go into the insurrectionary districts and procure by purchase, or by whatever means he chose, 250,000 bales of cotton; and if we are to measure the value of the contract by what was then the probable price of cotton, it will be seen that the contract had a money value of about $50,000,000. By the terms of this contract the United States was to furnish Mr. Noble transportation from the insurrectionary districts to the points of shipment, and the cotton was to be transported from those points to the city of New York and there sold. The proceeds of the sale were to be covered into the Treasury, and, by the terms of the contract, Mr. Noble was to receive three-fourths of the proceeds and the Government was to retain the remaining one-fourth.

Whether Mr. Noble was a loyal or a disloyal citizen of the United States at the time he and the Government made this contract is perhaps not a question of much importance in this debate.

That he was a mere adventurer is very plainly shown by the papers before me. That he was without means and had no ability to perform his contract can not be seriously questioned.

This contract Mr. Noble could not perform unless he had at his command many millions of dollars. Upon the evidence before me I am satisfied that he did not have enough money to pay for a single bale of cotton.

The Court of Claims found that when this contract was made there were 802 bales of cotton at Savannah which Mr. Noble claimed to have purchased, from John W. Anderson (171 bales), from Roswell Manufacturing Company (247 bales), from William Duncan (112 bales), and from Home Insurance Company (272 bales).

Nothing was before the court to show that Mr. Noble had cotton at any other point in the South, and hence we must conclude that his statement in the contract that he had 800 bales at Selma, 1,256 at Mobile, 200 at Rome, 1,800 at Savannah, and 4,000 to 5,000 at Augusta is untrue.

The 802 bales referred to, Mr. Noble claimed as his property, but before I take my seat I trust that I shall be able to convince the House that he was not the owner of a pound of this cotton.

It is claimed that Mr. Noble delivered to the Government these 802 bales of cotton upon his contract. He did no such thing. These bales were in a warehouse in Savannah and were seized by the Federal forces and as captured property was turned over to the United States Treasury agents by whom it was sold in New York and the proceeds, $144,922.85, covered into the Treasury.

Thus stands the case. What led to the legal dispute between the United States on the one hand, and Mr. Noble upon the other, respecting the contract, does not appear.

In June, 1870, Mr. Noble commenced a suit against the Government, upon the contract, in the Court of Claims, and in this suit he claimed that the Government had broken the contract and for this he ought to be paid $309,795.67, which sum he alleged to be the value of the cotton.

Damages resulting from the breach of the contract Mr. Noble did not claim. His idea at that time evidently was that he was entitled to the full value of the cotton, which he alleged to be $309,795.67, and he was unwilling to take the price ($144,922.85) for which the 802 bales were sold.

Upon the hearing of the case in the Court of Claims the court held the contract to be illegal, and turned Mr. Noble out of court.

This cotton was seized by the United States forces in 1865, and from the moment it was seized until August, 1868, a period of three years and more, Mr. Noble had the right under the captured and abandoned property act of March 12, 1863, to sue in the Court of Claims for the proceeds of this cotton. Why he did not seek the proceeds of this property in that court we are not informed. He brought no such suit, and his neglect in this particular is to me a mystery, and is not explained by anything which appears in his case. Within two years after his right to sue for the proceeds of this cotton was barred by the act of March 12, 1863, he appeared in the Court of Claims with a suit to recover the value of the cotton, which he alleged exceeded the proceeds in the sum of $164,872.82. This neglect to sue under the captured and abandoned property act for the proceeds of the cotton needs explanation. That he had a right to so sue is not questioned. That this right existed from 1865, when the cotton was seized, until August, 1868, when by the act the right was barred, is conceded.

Sir, I repeat, why this neglect, this gross, if not willful, neglect. The only explanation of this neglect is found by way of argument in the report from the Judiciary Committee made by the honorable gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

This report says that, until the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Lane case (8 Wallace, 185), Mr. Noble had the right to assume that his remedy was upon his contract and not under the abandoned and captured property act, for so the law had been held by the Court of Claims, not only in Lane's case, but in Burnside's case (3 Court of Claims, 367), and that the limitation of a suit upon his contract was six years. Very well; a suit upon his contract would have been barred in 1871, and it was June 15, 1870, when the suit upon the contract was brought.

It is impossible to state the day or the month in 1865 that the cotton was seized by the military forces of the United States; but the seizure was alleged by Mr. Noble to be a breach of the contract upon the part of the Government, and therefore, adopting his own theories, his right to sue upon his contract accrued in 1865, and in six years thereafter would be barred. In other words, he delayed suing upon his contract until very near the time when his right to sue would expire by limitation. When it is considered that he was claiming the Government was his debtor in a sum exceeding $300,000, his apparent indifference to his interests shows a want of confidence in the justice of his claim.

Is the neglect of Noble to sue under the captured and abandoned property act to be excused because the decision in Lane's case was reversed in the Supreme Court of the United States? The reversal was made, says the Judiciary Committee's report, on the 29th day of November, 1867. The right of Mr. Noble to sue under the captured and abandoned property act expired August 20, 1868. Before us then is the fact that the right to sue under the act referred to existed for near nine months after Lane's case was reversed in the Supreme Court. Still, no suit was brought under that act. Why not? The suit then pending upon the contract in the Court of Claims might have been dismissed at any moment within those nine months and a suit under the act immediately brought. This was not done.

Without dismissing the suit upon the contract another suit under the act might have been brought, and both suits be pending for trial and the one await the disposition made of the other. What was in the way of pursuing this course? Nothing, whatever.

Why did he not bring a suit for the proceeds rather than persist in his pending suit for the value of the cotton? The difference between the proceeds of the cotton and the value of the cotton was large ($144,922.85), and the difference possibly was controlling in suing for the value rather than for the proceeds of the cotton.

The failure to sue for the proceeds of the cotton under the captured and abandoned property act arose out of no mistake as to the remedy, and it is wrong to so claim. The remedy under this act was unquestioned, while a suit upon the contract for the value of the cotton was at best doubtful and uncertain. Between these two remedies—one for the value and the other for the proceeds—Mr. Noble elected, and to that election he ought to be held. But more time need not be spent on this feature of the case.

Mr. Chairman, there are three separate bills now pending before the House, each one of which has the purpose of getting for Mr. Noble the proceeds, if not the value, of these 802 bales of cotton. There is the bill which was introduced in the House by my honorable friend from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY], the bill which is now before the committee and which proposes to send this man to the Court of Claims to have his rights adjudicated. Then there comes to us from the Senate a bill proposing to relieve Samuel Noble, not as the House bill proposes to relieve him, by sending him to the Court of Claims to have his claim there adjudicated, but by sending him to the accounting officers of the Treasury, whoever they may be, for his money. In addition to these two measures for his relief my honorable friend from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. CULBERSON], proposes to relieve not only Samuel Noble, but also every other cotton claimant in like situation, by substituting for the bill for the relief of Samuel Noble a general bill for the relief of all cotton claimants by providing that they shall go to the Court of Claims to litigate their claims.

Mr. CULBERSON. The substitute to which the gentleman refers is not before the House, as it was objected to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. SENEY. I was not in my seat at the time the substitute was offered. I read in the RECORD that my friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] offered his general bill as a substitute for the bill introduced by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CULBERSON. While this matter was under consideration I asked unanimous consent to substitute the general bill for the bill for the relief of Mr. Noble. It required unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] objected. So the substitute is not before the House.

Mr. SENEY. I do not claim, Mr. Chairman, that the substitute is before the House.

Mr. CULBERSON. I thought you made that statement.

Mr. SENEY. No, sir; and I do not claim that the Senate bill is before us at this time. When, two weeks or more ago, this matter was before the House for consideration, the gentleman from Alabama offered the Senate bill as a substitute for the House bill; but I do not understand that we have anything else before us to-day than the House bill for the relief of Samuel Noble. I do not understand it to be claimed by the gentleman from Alabama that his motion to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill is now pending before the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the Government of the United States is indebted to Samuel Noble to the extent of a single farthing. I do not believe that the claim he has been urging for twelve years in Congress, and which he is now urging this House to pass, has the least particle of merit. I do not think that in this whole enterprise from its beginning to the present moment Samuel Noble ever owned one bale of this cotton; not even a pound or an ounce. I do not believe that he ever at any time invested in this enterprise the value of a single penny.

What the real facts may be in this case I do not know. I take as the groundwork of my argument the majority report of the Committee on the Judiciary and the findings of fact made by the Court of Claims in the case to which Samuel Noble was a party. I have said that his contract was one that contemplated the use of $50,000,000; and if at any time during the rebellion period Samuel Noble was possessed of 10 cents to buy cotton or to buy bread or meat, it nowhere appears in the record which has been presented to Congress.

Why, sir, it is asserted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] that Mr. Noble was a loyal citizen of the city of Rome during the rebellion; and up to the time when General Sherman occupied that city, which I believe was in July, 1864, that he was in Rome; but what he was doing in Rome nowhere in this record appears. Whether he was aiding the enemy or whether he was then claiming to be, as his friends now claim he was, a loyal citizen of the Government, we have no information anywhere in the facts which have turned up in this case.

I have said that he was a mere adventurer, without means, without ability to buy even a single bale of cotton; yet we find him engaging to deliver to the Government cotton of the value of $50,000,000. This property he undertook to get by hook or by crook in the insurrectionary districts, and when obtained to turn it over to the authorities of the United States, upon a contract to divide up the proceeds, three-fourths to be retained by himself and the residue to remain in the Treasury.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few words in further support of what I am claiming. Permit me to say I am moved by no feeling of unkindness toward Mr. Noble; for he is a gentleman I never saw; I do not know where he lives; and if he has an agent or an attorney at the Capitol looking after his claim I want to say to the House that although I have been opposing and resisting this claim for five years my eyes have never been gratified by even a sight of that gentleman. I do not know that that ought to detract from the merit of his claim.

Mr. FORNEY. Do you not think that ought to be in his favor?

Mr. SENEY. No, sir. If he wants $144,000 out of the Federal Treasury, he ought to show a personal interest in his case by appearing before a committee of this body and tell them upon what his claim is founded.

Mr. FORNEY. He simply asks now to go into court. He does not ask for money, but merely the privilege of showing in court that the Government has seized his cotton and retains the proceeds.

Mr. SENEY. Sir, he was once in the courts and the courts turned him out.

Mr. FORNEY. That was on account of the mistake of his lawyer in bringing the wrong suit.

Mr. SENEY. He was once in court reaching out with his greedy hands to filch from the Treasury $309,795.67, when the evidence in his case is that he never had a cent invested in the enterprise, never owned or had an interest measurable by dollars and cents or by legal rules in a single bale of this cotton.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. SENEY. Certainly. If I am not correct in my statement I shall be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. HERBERT. While I do not know much about the case, I do know that Mr. Noble is a gentleman who is not ashamed to show himself anywhere. He has been very closely engaged in the past few years in developing the industries of the State of Alabama, and is much devoted to his business. If he had had any idea that it was a proper thing for him to do to appear here in person and use his personal influence to carry this claim through the committee or through Congress, he would undoubtedly have been here. But he is at home attending to his own business, and relying simply upon the justice of the case. And to me it does not seem a fair objection to make that he has not come here personally to lobby in favor of his own case.

Mr. SENEY. Well, as I have already said, I know nothing of the claimant personally, and perhaps it is best that I should know nothing. It is probably best that we should look at his claim upon the facts that those who support the claim have presented to the House; and it is upon these facts, Mr. Chairman, that I stand here to discuss the claim, and to insist that it is entirely destitute of merit.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the report in Samuel Noble's case, made by the Court of Claims, and found in volume 11, at page 608:

At the request of claimant—

Says the court, Chief-Justice Drake delivering the opinion—

the court finds the following additional facts:

First, that all of the cotton purchased by claimant from the several parties as herein stated was seized by the United States military authorities at Savannah, Ga., and subsequent to said seizure shipped to Simeon Draper, United States cotton agent in New York, by whom the said several lots of cotton were sold, and the proceeds thereof accounted for to the Treasury of the United States.

Second—

This is a more material matter—

that the amount of the proceeds of the cotton which the claimant purchased from the Roswell Manufacturing Company, from John W. Anderson, from Aaron Wilbur (Home Insurance Company), and from William Duncan, and paid into the Treasury of the United States, was and is the sum of $144,922.85, and of which the proceeds of the cotton purchased by the claimant from John W. Anderson and from the Roswell Manufacturing Company was and is the sum of $82,434.76.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it appears from these findings that Mr. Samuel Noble purchased a portion of these 802 bales of cotton from John W. Anderson and from the Roswell Manufacturing Company, and that the proceeds of these two purchases (418 bales) are $82,434.76. Now, what interest had Samuel Noble in the cotton that he purchased from Anderson and in the cotton he purchased from the Roswell Manufacturing Company? These two purchases represent, say the Court of Claims, $82,434.76 of the fund Mr. Noble is pursuing. This sum is more than one-half of the amount Mr. Noble is claiming.

Mr. Chairman, I assert that Samuel Noble had no more interest in these two lots of cotton, the Anderson lot and the Roswell Manufacturing Company lot, or right to the proceeds, than have you. As a part of his case I read further from this report:

On the 25th of March, 1863, the petitioner (Noble) purchased of the Roswell Manufacturing Company 247 bales of upland cotton then stored in Savannah, in the State of Georgia; that on the 8th day of December, 1863, the petitioner (Noble) purchased of John W. Anderson 162 bales of sea island cotton and 9 of upland cotton, then stored in Savannah.

I read further:

On the 18th of March, 1865, the memorandum inclosed and marked "A" was made and signed by Mr. Noble, and by him delivered to and received by said Anderson.

SAVANNAH, 18th March, 1865.

The above cotton having been registered by John W. Anderson in the office of Colonel Ransom, United States Army, as my cotton, and having been furnished by the said John W. with a bill of sale of said cotton, bearing date December 8, 1863, but the consideration of said bill of sale having never been paid to the said John W., I do hereby promise and agree to sell said cotton in the city of New York by virtue of my contract with the Treasury agent of the United States, and when said cotton shall have been so sold to pay to the said John W. 70 per cent. of the net proceeds of said sale, which said 70 per cent. shall be the true consideration of said bill of sale.

(Signed) SAMUEL NOBLE.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here are two lots of cotton—the Anderson lot and the Roswell Manufacturing Company lot, representing 418 bales, for which Mr. Noble eighteen years ago asked the Court of Claims to pay him, and which he is now asking through the pending bill that the Court of Claims allow him. Is it not perfectly plain that in these 418 bales of cotton Mr. Noble had not invested a dollar? In the memorandum just read, Mr. Noble so states: It is true, sir, that the Court of Claims found that Noble made these two purchases in March, 1863, but, in the memorandum I have read, Noble admits that as late as March, 1865, no part of the purchase money had been paid. Sir, this admission of Mr. Noble is conclusive proof that he had no money invested in the Anderson and Roswell cotton. Two years after the purchase he still owed every dollar of the purchase money.

Mr. Chairman, this memorandum tells us that whatever were the rights of Anderson, Roswell, and Noble respecting the 418 bales of cotton in 1863, they were changed by this memorandum in March, 1865. From the date of the purchase in March, 1863, to the date of the memorandum in March, 1865, it may be that Mr. Noble was the owner of the cotton. This property during this entire period was in a wareroom in Savannah, and was there under circumstances which required its presence at that place to be kept a secret from all of the world, saving and excepting only Anderson, Roswell, and Noble. In this memorandum Mr. Noble tells us that he purchased this cotton in March and December, 1863. Mr. Chairman, if my recollection is not at fault, at that time the people with whom he was dealing were in open and armed rebellion against the Government of the United States. Claiming as he does that he was loyal to the Government from the beginning to the end of the war, will the advocates of this bill for his relief inform the House whether in buying cotton from these people and engaging to furnish them with money for that product he was on the Union or Confederate side of that angry and bitter strife?

The memorandum to which I refer shows that these parties made a second deal respecting this cotton. Under the first deal it may be that Mr. Noble was for two years the owner of the cotton. If so, his ownership ceased in March, 1865. The memorandum shows a rescission of the sale by Anderson and Roswell and of purchase by Noble. It shows that Noble was no longer a debtor and Anderson and Roswell no longer were creditors. The memorandum shows that the sum in which Noble was indebted to Anderson and Roswell for the cotton was released and that the cotton from and after March, 1865, was the property of Anderson and Roswell.

By making the memorandum and delivering it to Anderson any and all right of ownership before then in Noble became vested in Anderson and Roswell. After March, 1865, Anderson and Roswell were the owners of the cotton, and consequently their right to the proceeds admits of no question. Why, then, send Mr. Noble to the Court of Claims to litigate for the proceeds of the Roswell and Anderson cotton?

Again, this memorandum shows a promise and agreement of Noble to deliver the cotton to the Government of the United States, for the purpose of sale, by its agent, in New York, and a further agreement to pay Anderson and Roswell 70 per cent. of the proceeds. Why such an agreement if Anderson and Roswell were not then the owners of the cotton, in possession of it, dictating and directing the disposition to be made of the property?

Again, the memorandum shows that to 70 per cent. of the proceeds of this cotton Mr. Noble has no claim whatever. This share of the proceeds, by his own admission, does not belong to him, but belongs to Anderson and Roswell Manufacturing Company. Will this House send Mr. Noble to the Court of Claims to get this portion of the proceeds? That court now knows that it is not his. Congress knows the same thing. The Treasury Department knows it belongs to others.

Again: Twenty-five per cent. of the proceeds of this cotton under Mr. Noble's contract with the Government is the rightful property of the United States. Surely Mr. Noble has no right to have any portion of this fourth part of the proceeds. What interest, then, has he in the proceeds of the Anderson and Roswell cotton? The memorandum says that 70 per cent. of the proceeds shall be paid to Anderson and Roswell, but it is silent as to the remaining 30 per cent. Of this 30 per cent., as stated a moment ago, the Government is the rightful claimant to all except 5 per cent. Is 5 per cent., then, the extent of Mr. Noble's interest in the proceeds of the Anderson and Roswell cotton? If so, it can not be that he owned the cotton, or that he ought to be sent to the courts to swear for all of the proceeds.

If, in this transaction, from first to last, Noble was the agent of the owners of the cotton, and the 5 per cent. represents his commission, this portion of the proceeds shall not go out of the Treasury by my vote. Sir, if we authorize even by indirection that the proceeds of these two lots of cotton, amounting to $82,434.76, be paid to Mr. Noble, is there anything in the way of Anderson and the Roswell Manufacturing Company asserting their claim to the same money?

Why, Mr. Chairman, upon every legal and equitable principle this memorandum when signed and delivered by Mr. Noble created a trust as to the cotton and its proceeds, and the beneficiaries to the extent of 95 per cent. are Roswell and Anderson and the Government of the United States. To the proceeds, or 95 per cent. thereof, Noble by his memorandum divested himself of all right or claim.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SENEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. Is there any claim set up now before the Treasury Department against the fund by the other parties to whom you allude?

Mr. SENEY. I do not know how that is. I am arguing as to the legal rights of Samuel Noble. Has he the right to this money?

Mr. HOOKER. There is no claim, then.

Mr. SENEY. The question with me is not whether the Roswell Manufacturing Company or Anderson may claim this money, but what right has Samuel Noble to the money? And if he has no right, it is a matter of supreme indifference to me who has the right.

Mr. HERBERT. On your theory that there was a trust, is not the trustee entitled to recover the money?

Mr. SENEY. Mr. Noble could not be his own trustee, and in this case the Government is the trustee, and holds the fund for the beneficiaries, Anderson and the Roswell Manufacturing Company.

Mr. HERBERT. As trustee, with the right to recover the property himself, if it belonged to him, or to the other parties that he had promised to pay them, was not he the trustee and would he not have the right to recover?

Mr. SENEY. I ask you what interest this man had in these two lots of cotton. Clearly, unmistakably none; for he by the terms of the memorandum referred to was to give to Anderson and the Roswell Manufacturing Company 70 per cent. of the proceeds, and therefore he has no legal or equitable interest in the 70 per cent. What interest has he, then, in the remaining 30 per cent? None whatever. Under his contract in 1865 the Government was to retain of the proceeds of that cotton 25 per cent. Now, when you take the Anderson cotton and the Roswell Manufacturing Company's cotton and give to the Government its 25 per cent. and to the Anderson and Roswell Manufacturing Company their 70 per cent., tell me, will you, what remains for Samuel Noble? An agent's commission of 5 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to think of this claim and resist the conviction that Mr. Noble was not the merest and sheerest of adventurers, and without the least ability to perform his engagement with the Government.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. SENEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOOKER. In point of fact did Mr. Noble perform his engagement? Did he deliver the cotton?

Mr. SENEY. No, sir, he did not deliver the cotton. As I said before, he had but 802 bales of cotton that he claimed to be his own. When the Federal troops at Savannah seized upon that cotton it was stored in a warehouse in that city, and over that warehouse and over the cotton in it Mr. Samuel Noble had absolute, complete, and entire control. He had not delivered the cotton; he had never offered to deliver it; the cotton in the warehouse had never been appropriated to or turned over upon the contract; it was still ostensibly the property of Mr. Noble, and of nobody else.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Do you mean that it was the property of Noble?

Mr. SENEY. I mean that Mr. Noble claimed it to be his property. Certain it is that it had not been turned over to the Government or did the Government receive it from him.

Mr. FORNEY. Did not Mr. Noble make a contract with the Government of the United States that he would deliver them so much cotton at Savannah?

Mr. SENEY. No, sir; he made a contract with the Government of the United States to deliver 250,000 bales of cotton, and as an inducement to that contract he misrepresented to the Treasury officials the number of bales of cotton that he then owned and had on hand to turn over on his contract.

Mr. FORNEY. I do not know anything about his misrepresenting.

Mr. SENEY. The Court of Claims says so. That is all I know about it.

Mr. FORNEY. What was his contract with the Government? Was it not to deliver so much cotton at Savannah?

Mr. SENEY. He made a contract to deliver 250,000 bales of cotton at different points in the South.

Mr. FORNEY. And you say he had 802 bales in Savannah; now, did not he deliver those?

Mr. SENEY. No; he delivered none.

Mr. FORNEY. Was he to carry the cotton to Savannah?

Mr. SENEY. It was in Savannah that he made his contract.

Mr. FORNEY. And was not he to turn it over to the Government?

Mr. SENEY. But he never did turn it over.

Mr. FORNEY. Because the Government took it.

Mr. SENEY. The Federal troops seized it.

Mr. FORNEY. They took it, and the proceeds are now in the Treasury.

Mr. SENEY. I am not disputing that they took the cotton, and I am not disputing that the proceeds of it are in the Treasury. The point that I wish to impress upon the House is that Mr. Samuel Noble has no more right to a single penny of the proceeds of the cotton of which you speak than I have myself.

Mr. FORNEY. Then you admit that if Noble has not, Anderson and the Roswell Manufacturing Company have?

Mr. SENEY. Certainly. They are the parties.

Mr. FORNEY. And what does Mr. Noble propose to do?

Mr. SENEY. O, Lord! I don't know what he proposes to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORNEY. He proposes to go into court to show that it was his cotton.

Mr. SENEY. All I know as to what your friend, Mr. Noble, proposes to do is from the bill put forward here in his behalf.

Mr. FORNEY. Well, that is what the bill proposes, that he shall have his day in court to show that this cotton was his.

Mr. SENEY. But he has had his day in court.

Mr. FORNEY. Certainly; but now he wants another day. [Laughter.]

Mr. SENEY. Yes; and that is where the trouble comes in. The gentleman from Alabama understands very well that one day in court is the rule, not two, not one day this year and another day next year. When a man has once been in court his claim is adjudicated and litigation respecting it is at an end; to use a technical expression, it is res adjudicata.

Mr. WHEELER. Is that so in all kinds of cases?

Mr. SENEY. I think so.

Mr. WHEELER. Not in ejectments. Under the English law they have sometimes two or three trials of ejectments.

Mr. SENEY. Well, general, you and I will talk about the law generally at some other time.

Mr. WHEELER. But your statement was too broad; and in these cases two trials are sometimes given, just as in cases of other kinds.

Mr. SENEY. Well, hereafter you and I will discuss the general legal question. Mr. Chairman, there is every reason to believe that Mr. Noble was used as a mere cover by men who could not assert their rights to the cotton they had on hand in the insurrectionary districts. I think that is the secret of the whole business. Clearly he had nothing with which to buy cotton. How he got his contract from the Treasury officials is a mystery, and only the Lord knows how he persuaded that good man, President Lincoln, to give him an indorsement and to write upon the back of his contract a permit to go at will through the lines, and give him an order to those then in command for transportation.

Can you, sir, imagine that this man could in 1863 buy of the Roswell Manufacturing Company and of Anderson $82,000 worth of property for which confessedly he did not pay one cent. What was that for? Why, sir, I judge from the memoranda referred to that Anderson and the Roswell Manufacturing Company were disloyal; and that if they should have registered their cotton with the Government officer in the South it would have been forfeited to the Government. So they cast about; and here was this convenient man, Mr. Noble; he could be used; he was a loyal citizen; he had a contract; he had the order of the President giving him protection and ordering that transportation be given him. He was just the man of all men for those cotton men in the South who could not claim their own cotton. He was the man to step in and claim it for them, taking it upon joint account—upon a sort of speculation, and turning it over upon his Government contract. Of the proceeds he, in his great strait, gave to Anderson and the manufacturing company 75 per cent., the Government, of course, retaining under its contract 25 per cent.

But this is not all. There is another matter to be considered. The Court of Claims say:

On the 11th day of March, 1865, the said petitioner (Mr. Noble) purchased of the Home Insurance Company 203 bales of Sea Island cotton and 69 bales of upland cotton then stored in the city of Savannah.

And this cotton is a part of the 802 bales for which eighteen years ago Mr. Noble wanted to be paid over $309,000, and for which, by the bill which is now being pressed in this House, it is sought to help him to $144,000.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The gentleman has spoken of the Home Insurance Company. That is a company of what State?

Mr. SENEY. Of the State of Georgia, I believe. At first it occurred to me it was the Home Insurance Company of New York but afterward I concluded it was some local company in the South.

Mr. BLOUNT. Did not the permit given to Mr. Noble by President Lincoln contemplate the purchase of cotton from disloyal citizens?

Mr. SENEY. Yes; I think so. That is my notion about it. I think President Lincoln took that course to cripple the enemy—to deprive them of the means of prosecuting the war—to get from them the products they were raising, and disable them in that way. That is my notion; I do not know whether it is correct.

Mr. ROGERS. To paralyze "the sinews of war."

Mr. SENEY. Yes, to paralyze the sinews of war.

Now, let us see for a moment what interest Mr. Noble had in the cotton which he claims to have purchased from the Home Insurance Company. Why, sir, I am able to assert that he did not pay a penny to the Home Insurance Company on the contract made with them in March, 1863. As I understand the facts, that purchase amounted to $40,000; yet the Home Insurance Company seemingly sold that cotton to Mr. Noble and did not exact from him even a penny upon the purchase. There was no advance money, no earnest money, no security whatever. Certainly it will not be claimed that Mr. Noble has such an interest in the Home Insurance Company's cotton that his friends ought to be here asking this House to pass a bill for his relief.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury addressed to myself, bearing date June 28, 1888, from which, with the indulgence of the House, I will read one paragraph:

Attention is called to the fact that at the December term, 1872, the Home Insurance company obtained a judgment in the Court of Claims, volume 8, page 449, Court of Claims Reports) for the net proceeds of 202 bales of sea-island cotton captured by the military forces at Savannah in 1865, which judgment, amounting to the sum of $35,529.58, was afterward, on April 3, 1875, duly paid from the appropriation, "Return of proceeds of captured and abandoned property."

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. That judgment was against whom?

Mr. SENEY. Against the Government of the United States for this very cotton.

These 202 bales, the proceeds of which were paid to the insurance company, appear to be the same cotton designated as 203 bales which make up in part the 802 bales alleged to be owned by this claimant, and the net proceeds of which he now claims.

Sir, I look through the report of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, but find no statement respecting this payment—$35,529.58. I repeat, eighteen years ago Mr. Noble wanted from the Treasury the value of the Home Insurance Company cotton. It was not his cotton; another claimed it and got the proceeds. This $35,000 constituted a part of the $309,000 he asked the Court of Claims to give him, and constitutes a part of the $144,000 that his friends are now insisting to be his due from the Treasury of the United States. Strange that this man, if he was loyal, strange if he be a good citizen, strange if he be an honest man, that he did not put into the ear of those advocating his pretensions that $35,000 of his claim had been reduced by a payment made to the Home Insurance Company eleven years ago.

Now, one thing more, and I have done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SENEY. I think I have shown to the House, and demonstrated beyond the possibility of doubt, that in the three lots of cotton Mr. Noble had not a single stiver of interest.

Now, then, as to the fourth lot of cotton. On the 16th of January, 1865, he purchased of William Duncan 62 bales of sea island and 50 bales of upland cotton, then stored in the city of Savannah, say the Court of Claims, and for this he wants pay. Some of his friends want to send him to the Court of Claims and have his rights there adjudicated, and the remaining portion are trying to get him into the very vaults of the Treasury with authority to take the money. With respect to the fourth lot of cotton—the Duncan cotton—do I hazard anything when I say that he paid no more to Duncan on that purchase than he paid to Anderson, to the Roswell Manufacturing Company, or to the Home Insurance Company upon the purchases claimed to have been made from them? It is safe to assume that if there be a claimant to this fund—the Duncan fund—that the claimant is not Samuel Noble, but is Duncan himself.

Mr. Chairman, if the House refuses to send this claimant to the Court of Claims he ought not to complain, and if in the late civil strife he was, and still is, loyal to the Government of the United States, surely he will not complain. The Government of the United States has been good to Samuel Noble—better to him than to any other citizen whose name I am now able to recall, and this goodness ought to go far in satisfying him for any failure upon his part to make money in buying and selling cotton at a time when every other citizen at the North and at the South, whether loyal or disloyal, was sacrificing so much in treasure or in blood to meet the exigencies occasioned by the war.

The Government was good to Mr. Noble, better, perhaps, than he deserved, in not exacting from him military service—and better still in making for him an opportunity which at the time promised to fill his pockets with many millions of dollars. The necessities of war compelled the forcible seizure of this cotton. The Government was good to Mr. Noble, and good to all others from whom property was captured, in not declaring it forfeited for their rebellion against lawful authority. The Government was good to these erring people when during the war and for two years after its close it opened wide the door of one of her judicial tribunals and bid them enter and prove their claims to what had been captured or to the proceeds then in the Treasury.

The Government did wisely and well in declaring to all from whom property had been captured during the war, that unless they submitted their claims for adjudication to one of her courts within two years after the close of the war they would be forever barred. For twenty years these claims for captured cotton have been barred. To remove this bar and again open the courts for their adjudication, either by a special act for a single claimant or by a general law for all claimants, would be unwise, and with my vote it will never be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has caused an examination of the record of this case to be made, and it appears from that that the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] was adopted by the committee. The amendment, therefore, of the gentleman from Texas to the committee's amendment is now in order, and the Clerk will report that amendment to the committee's amendment, in order that members present may understand the exact status of the question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That a greater amount of money shall not be paid in satisfaction of this claim than the amount actually received into the Treasury as the net proceeds of the sale of cotton alleged to have been taken.

Mr. OATES. I would like that amendment to be adopted at once, for I think it is an entirely proper one.

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio in the greater part of his remarks has thrown a good deal of fog over this case. The latter part, with reference to the matter concerning which he introduced a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, is a question which requires consideration and is the only point he has made against the bill which seems to have merit.

Now, if gentlemen will give me their attention, I will endeavor to state the facts of this case, all that are pertinent, as succinctly as possible; so that the committee may be placed in full possession of all that is involved.

Samuel Noble was a citizen of Rome, Ga., during the war, and claimed to have been a Union man and loyal to the Union during that period. When they undertook to enforce the conscript act as to him, he passed through the Confederate lines and took the oath of loyalty to the Union. He came to Washington and made a contract with an agent of the Treasury, a man named Risley, alluded to by the gentleman from Ohio, and returned within the Confederate lines for the purchase of cotton for shipment through the Confederate lines and into the Union. It was at that time the policy of the Government of the United States to get all the cotton that could be obtained within the Confederate lines, as it was regarded as one of the important sinews of war.

Now, in order to facilitate Noble's operations on that line President Lincoln gave him a paper as a safe conduct, addressed to the commanders of the Union armies everywhere, to pass him and any cotton he might obtain through their lines and into the Union lines. I do not know how much cotton he owned or bought or how much he obtained. He claims to have owned 802 bales which were seized by the military forces at Savannah, Ga., in 1865. After the war he brought a suit in the Court of Claims, which was decided in 1875 at the December term adversely to him for the reason that the suit was brought to recover damages for violation or breach of contract which Risley had entered into with him by the seizure of the 802 bales of cotton, which were shipped to New York and sold. The proceeds of that cotton are now in the Treasury to the credit of the captured and abandoned property fund. He petitions to be allowed to bring a new suit, because the court held that the contract which he had entered into with Risley was not a lawful one; that Risley exceeded his authority under the statutes of the United States in respect to that contract. Notwithstanding it was recognized by Mr. Lincoln as lawful it was not in accordance with the law and rulings of the Treasury Department, and hence he could not recover damages for the breach of it.

The gentleman from Ohio says, "Why did he not proceed to obtain the net proceeds of the sale of the cotton under the captured and abandoned property act?" That is a question that is very easily answered. The law was to the effect that the United States by their armies should take possession of captured or abandoned property to be sold and the net proceeds turned into the Treasury to be paid out to loyal citizens of the United States at any time within two years after the close of the war upon their going before the Court of Claims and proving that it was their property.

Now, mark you, the President of the United States published his proclamation declaring that the war was terminated August 20, 1866; consequently on the 20th of August, 1868, that law expired of its own limitation, and no man, loyal or disloyal, could bring any suit under it since. Noble could not bring any suit in the Court of Claims except in pursuance of a statute, and there has been none since 1868, the clause in the captured-and-abandoned-property act which authorized such suits having expired at that time.

Since that time there has been no law, except where Congress has passed one in each particular case, by which a man could go into the Court of Claims and establish his rights to the proceeds of the sales of his property which the United States holds in trust for him and does not claim. To-day there is in the Treasury of the United States about $10,500,000 which the United States does not claim, and the Supreme Court in three or four well-considered cases has said so. The United States holds that money simply as trustee. The seizure was not a confiscation of the property at all. It was sold and the proceeds covered into the Treasury to be held for the owner of the property to prove before the Court of Claims that he was entitled to the proceeds.

But the claimants can not get before the Court of Claims until we authorize them to go there by the enactment of a statute.

The judgment of the Court of Claims was given in December, 1875; whereas the law which authorized the claim of the net proceeds had expired on the 20th of August 1868. Now, Mr. Noble is not a lawyer, but he is a reputable citizen. He did not agree with me in politics during the war, nor does he now, but he is a gentleman, and I intend so far as I can to secure to him his personal rights, and if he has not an interest in this cotton to the extent named in this bill, he has certainly to a large extent.

Now, the gentleman says the evidence before the Court of Claims shows that he has no interest in this cotton; that he has no claim whatever. The gentleman from Ohio has undertaken to try and determine here every question that we want to refer to the Court of Claims. I want the Court of Claims to try Noble's right to the money that cotton sold for, but the gentleman from Ohio insists that he and not the court shall try the claim.

Since the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] this claimant must prove his loyalty and that he never gave aid and comfort to the Confederate cause, before he can recover. What else? He must necessarily prove that he was the owner of this cotton and trace the proceeds or he can not recover. No man can. Does the gentleman assert the proposition that any claimant before the Court of Claims under that law can recover unless he proves to the satisfaction of the court that he was the owner of the property, that it was sold, and that its proceeds were covered into the Treasury?

Mr. SENEY. Certainly not; but if he has no claim at all, what then?

Mr. OATES. If he has no claim at all the court will decide against him, and no one is hurt. Is there any harm in that? Why should he not have his day in court?

Mr. SENEY. Under the terms of his contract he has no claim.

Mr. OATES. Ah, yes; you figure up that there were about $80,000 of the proceeds for these two lots which he bought and then there were $65,000 left.

Mr. SENEY. Thirty-five thousand has been paid. You are claiming something that he does not claim. He admits now that he has no claim.

Mr. OATES. I deny that proposition; and you have no proof of it.

Mr. SENEY. I read from his own statement that is contained in that volume of the report of the Court of Claims. That is all I know about it.

Mr. OATES. Now, before the court would give a judgment the judges would have to be convinced that he was the owner of the cotton or they would not entertain the demand. But suppose that he proves that he was the owner of one-half or any other portion; that is a question for the court to determine. But the gentleman from Ohio undertakes to settle that question here and now by his judgment simply from some things which he extracts from the record which was made in the case heretofore decided. I submit that this is not a fair test.

That is no way to administer justice to this man. Give him his day in court; that is what he asks for. The gentleman from Ohio claims that the case is res adjudicata, but he knows that doctrine does not apply. Let Noble go to the Court of Claims and submit his evidence. He must prove that he was the owner of the cotton, and if he fails to prove that, if he was not the owner of any part of it, he can not get judgment for a dollar of the proceeds.

He must not only do that, but he must show that his cotton—not another man's, but his own cotton—was sold, and that the proceeds went into the Treasury, before he would be entitled to a judgment for any part of it.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Was his ownership or interest in the property changed by the last suit?

Mr. OATES. Not at all; the case turned on a different question.

Mr. SENEY. He did not have any to be changed; he will not claim that it was changed. I will submit this further: This man under his own hand in the Court of Claims has acknowledged that he has no interest in that cotton. That is the point.

Mr. OATES. Ah! that was when he was claiming that it was the property of the United States; when he was suing for damages for a breach of contract; but when he failed in that, he, like every other citizen, ought to have the right to go before the court and let the court decide whether he was the owner of any of this cotton the proceeds of the sale of which he now claims.

The plea of my friend from Ohio amounts to nothing except the statute of limitations. That is what it is in effect, though the statute of limitation does not apply. This is simply the case of a trust fund lying in the Treasury with no means provided by law for getting it out, and this bill proposes to allow this man to go before the Court of Claims and submit his evidence to show his ownership, to show that this cotton was sold and that the proceeds of it are in the Treasury, and, with the amendment which has been adopted, he is required to show more, namely, that he was a loyal citizen of the United States.

So far as the status of a party before the court is concerned loyalty does not cut any figure in the law; but the Congress have the right, if they see proper, and they have seen proper thus far, to put a provision in the act allowing a party to go before the Court of Claims, requiring him to prove his loyalty.

This is all that I can see in this case. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury states that in his opinion 203 bales of the cotton—the proceeds of which this man is claiming—have been recovered by another claimant.

If that be true, the court will ascertain the fact and will not give Noble judgment for that. I would not have them adjudge one dollar of it to Mr. Noble that did not belong to him, and I have too high an opinion of that gentleman to believe that he would accept a dollar of it if he did not believe it was his.

I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEWART.]

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I would not claim the attention of the committee if this question rested alone upon the disposition of the rights of Mr. Noble, but it will be remembered that this claim involves a part of a fund of nearly $11,000,000, which is now in the Treasury of the United States and the legal status of which has been settled by the highest court in the country, which court has declared that this fund is not the property of the United States, but that it belongs to the parties whose property was seized and sold, and that the Government holds it as a trust fund. There are many reasons connected with this case, so far as Mr. Noble is concerned, why I might feel opposed to his claim.

While I personally know him, and while I am here to say that he is a good citizen, intelligent and upright, yet, differing from him in so many respects so far as our past relations to the Government are concerned, it might naturally be supposed I would oppose his claim. But we are here to deal justly, and I desire to ask the attention of the committee to the consideration of this question. Here is a fund, the status of which has already been adjudicated and settled, namely, that this money and other money in the United States Treasury does not belong to the United States Government. It is the proceeds of property seized and sold by Federal authority, and when the question is raised by claimants whether they can recover any portion of this money or not they are met with the plea of the statutes of limitation, or with the plea, as in this case, that the claimant has no title. My friend has labored to show that Mr. Noble has only a contingent interest, if any at all, and that is one of the questions which should be left to the court, and is a good reason for supporting this bill.

If the question of parties and the extent of claimant's interest are a legal reason why this case should not be heard in the courts, then this fund is to remain in the Treasury forever. The United States Government is a sovereign invested with sovereign power, and can not be sued except by legislative act; yet when claimants come here and ask for such authority, ask for the privilege of being allowed to sue for the establishment of their rights, my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] says to them, "Your rights shall not be adjudicated in court for the reason that there appears to be some question about your ownership of the property, and the extent of your interests is not certain." Mr. Chairman, where shall we test the question of ownership? In what tribunal?

Is it not a well-established rule, in regard to which no lawyer or wise legislator would hesitate for a moment, that if there be a prima facie case of right, the question should be sent to the court and the court be left to determine whether the right to the property is complete in the claimant or not? If this claimant is to be barred from going into court simply because the Home Insurance Company claim a part of this property, or some other party claims a portion of it, what becomes of his rights? We can not adjudicate those questions here. Will the gentleman from Ohio claim that we should be invested with the high prerogative of a petit jury to settle these questions of fact? Sir, I was amazed at the distinguished gentleman seeking to place this House in the attitude of a jury, and, worse than that, calling upon them to decide the case without examination and to say to this claimant, "We turn you away when you appeal for justice, because possibly your right to the property is only a right to one-half or one-third of it."

Mr. SENEY. What disposition do you make now of the report of the Court of Claims, and of the facts which that report found in the case?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. The question before the Court of Claims was this: Mr. Noble insisted that a contract had been made with him by the officials of the Government, and he claimed that he had performed his part of the contract, had purchased the property and carried it to the place where he was to deliver it; that thereupon the Government seized it, and that thereby a right of action for damages accrued to him.

And upon a hearing of the case for damages for breach of contract as contended for by Mr. Noble; the court simply held that the Government having seized this with other property, no right of action arose upon that contract as an action sounding in damages.

Mr. SENEY. As a predicate of that holding of the court, the court was bound, was it not, to find some facts? Now, what disposition do you make of those facts in your argument?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I make this disposition of them: The court did find he had a contract; the court did find that he purchased cotton; the court did find that the strong arm of the Government seized the cotton; the court did find that the proceeds of the cotton are lying to-day in the Treasury doing no good, and that the Government has no title to them. That is what the court found, and those are the facts upon which the claim is now based.

Mr. OATES. Let me suggest to the gentleman that now it does not make any difference whether he had any contract or not. This was cotton of his which was taken, and the question now is simply whether we will allow him to go into court and assert his claim.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I desire to present an additional reason why Noble's case should be heard: this question having been adjudicated that the Government is not liable for damages, the next question to be adjudicated is this: Did the Government get this cotton, and had Mr. Noble an interest in it; and has he made such a showing as would justify us in sending his claim to a court for adjudication?

Mr. SENEY. There I take issue with the gentleman. The Government found that he had no interest.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. And I rejoice that we are not a petit jury, as we might sit up all night upon a disagreement on that question. We will leave that matter to the courts, where it properly belongs.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois (to Mr. STEWART, of Georgia). Do you accede to the statement that the Government found he had no interest in it?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. Oh, no!

Mr. SENEY. What I mean to say is that written admissions which were in evidence before the Court of Claims show clearly and unequivocally that he had no interest in the cotton.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Of course he could not prosecute for damages.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. He could not prosecute for damages under the contract, for want of delivery, and the paper referred to shows he had an interest.

Mr. OATES. On the ground that the contract was not in conformity with the rules and requirements of the Treasury Department was a ground upon which the Court of Claims held against him.

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. I want to present to this committee but one other view of this case. The money is in the Treasury, proceeds of the cotton sold; there is no controversy about that. Now, shall we here to-day, because we represent the Government in all its sovereignty, say to a humble citizen "You shall not be heard." He is not asking for any money; he is simply making his appeal to this branch of the Government, saying, "I have a claim upon a fund in the hands of the Government, and only by your action can I be heard as to my right to recover what is due me." That is all he asks. Although, as a citizen of the Southern portion of the country, I may feel that when he went through the lines he ought not to have done so; yet as a matter of abstract justice and right toward a humble citizen, when he comes and says, "This money is mine; my claim is just; my sovereign Government holds it; I can not sue the Government, but Congress can authorize me to bring an action in the courts," shall we shut the door of justice forever against him and say "You shall not be heard?" That is the whole issue in this case.

I again repeat, I would not have said thus much, but I want members of the House to bear in mind that this $11,000,000, of which this fund is a part, much of it, as I am informed, belongs to widows and orphans, to the helpless and defenseless; and I want to know whether we are to establish the precedent here to-day that these widows and orphans shall not be heard, that these defenseless women and children shall not have an opportunity to adjudicate the question in regard to their right to a portion of this fund, when the Government has already said: "We do not own it; it belongs to those persons whose property we seized and sold."

Mr. OATES. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill, but not for the reasons assigned by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY]. It may be a proper and just claim, and for the purpose of my argument I will admit that it is, but I am constrained to oppose it for the reason that its passage possibly may, to some extent at least, trench upon the captured and abandoned property fund which is held by the Government in trust for a large number of claimants, some of whom live in my district and State. It is alleged that this claimant was loyal. He may have been. My constituents as a rule were not loyal between 1861 and 1865, but they have as much right to this fund as those who were, under the law and the Supreme Court decisions, and I intend to see as far as I can that the real owners and producers of the cotton seized are not discriminated against in favor of agents of the Government and speculators who may be able to show their loyalty. In disbursing this trust-money Congress should be more concerned about the fairness and honesty of its own acts and the doings of Government officials than about forgiven disloyalty.

Out of a fund of nearly $32,000,000, over $10,000,000 was paid out as expenses and released on the orders of Secretaries, prior to March 30, 1872, before the money was ever covered into the Treasury. Under the resolution of that date there was covered into the Treasury the sum of $20,971,790.96. Since that time the sum of $10,459,783 has been paid out, on special acts, judgments, and for expenses. So we see, Mr. Chairman, that this trust-money is going very fast. Two-thirds of it has been disbursed and I think much of it to those who had no right to it either in law or equity. I believe in passing a general bill removing the statute bar, and if that is not done I intend, as far as I can, to see that the money of my constituents is not given to men of questionable methods as a reward for that kind of affidavit loyalty that we hear so much about on this floor.

The people who raised the cotton, though disloyal for a time, were honest, and the survivors are as loyal to-day as any man in this House; and I deny the right of any member to question it in view of the proclamations of Presidents Lincoln and Johnson and the Supreme Court decisions based thereon. Much of the cotton was seized long after the cessation of hostilities, and was forcibly taken from the possession of the owners by the "regularly documented" agents of the Government, who got 25 per cent. of all they could find. Some of them took all they found. The sales were irregular and unfair, and the fund has been illegally used. It has been a sort of lick-log for the hangers-on around the Treasury.

I know something about how this money has been disbursed, because I have made a point to go through all the testimony that has been taken, touching the seizure, sale, and disposition; and I say now that there never has been connected with the Government more rascality, or more recklessness in connection with any fund, than there has been with this. You can scarcely find an honest claim that has been paid. They have all been paid on the basis of loyalty, and at the expense of honesty. This ought to stop; and I hope that this Congress will see that the remaining $10,000,000 of that fund shall be either kept in the Treasury of the United States or paid to the men who are entitled to it, in accordance with the decision in Paddlefords' case.

I did not intend to speak against the bill until it was so amended as to require proof of loyalty, but was satisfied to quietly vote against it; but now with that amendment, which may be used against my constituents, I can not remain silent. This claim may be honest, but at the same time I do not have much faith in the average cotton agent whose patriotism and loyalty in times of war leads him within the lines of the enemy "for revenue." I am willing to give him a chance with all the balance of the claimants, but I will not consent to give him any advantage over as good men.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Your opinion is that there should be a general bill covering all of these cases, and not let it little by little all be taken up in these private bills?

Mr. MCRAE. Yes, I want the statute bar of two years removed as to all so as to give them all the same chance.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. And that is the only way to do it.

Mr. MCRAE. It is the only honest way to do it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to read the portion of the special message of President Lincoln touching the proclamations he had issued, and that he had the right to issue under the Constitution. And I will remark, Mr. Chairman, that these proclamations were after a suggestion from Congress that it would aid in the suppression of the rebellion to make such an offer. It did. It was a proper and manly thing for him to do, and no just man would destroy the effect of such action of his.

The Clerk read as follows:

Laws and proclamations were enacted and put forth for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of the rebellion. To give their fullest effect there had to be a pledge for their maintenance. In my judgment they have aided and will further aid the cause for which they were intended. To now abandon them would not only be to relinquish a lever of power, but would also be a cruel and astounding breach of faith. For these and other reasons it is thought best that support of these measures shall be included in the oath, and it is believed the Executive may lawfully claim it in return for pardon and restoration of forfeited rights, which he has clear constitutional power to withhold altogether or grant upon the terms which he shall deem wisest for the public interest.

Mr. MCRAE. Now, Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk reads the next I want to say that the amnesty proclamations of Mr. Lincoln offered a restoration of all property rights, except as to slaves, upon condition that they would take the amnesty oath. By this the title to this money vested in loyal and disloyal alike.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCRAE. I would like to have additional time to complete this reading. I do not want to occupy any unnecessary time, and have not, therefore, sought to get an hour, as I might do under the rules.

Mr. SENEY. Allow me to ask whether or not the gentleman has not the right to take the floor in his own time?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this time; the gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCRAE. I do not desire to obstruct the consideration of the Calendar by taking up any additional time, but I want two or three minutes in order to have read a portion of President Johnson's proclamation. I will insist upon this even if I have to take the floor in my own right later. I shall only want a few minutes to finish, and would much prefer to do so now with the consent of my friend from Alabama.

Mr. OATES. I yield to the gentleman a few minutes longer.

Mr. MCRAE. I now ask the Clerk to read the final proclamation of President Johnson, which is full and unconditional. I have indicated in the RECORD by pencil marks the part to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the President of the United States has heretofore set forth several proclamations, offering amnesty and pardon to persons who had been or were concerned in the late rebellion against the lawful authority of the Government of the United States, which proclamations were severally issued on the 8th day of December, 1863, on the 26th day of March, 1864, on the 29th day of May, 1865, on the 7th day of September, 1867, and on the 4th day of July, in the present year; and

Whereas the authority of the Federal Government having been re-established in all the States and Territories within the jurisdiction of the United States, it is believed that such prudential reservations and exceptions as at the dates of said several proclamations were deemed necessary and proper may now be wisely and justly relinquished, and that a universal amnesty and pardon for participation in said rebellion extended to all who have borne any part therein will tend to secure permanent peace, order, and prosperity throughout the land, and to renew and fully restore confidence and fraternal feeling among the whole people, and their respect for and attachment to the National Government, designed by its patriotic founders for the general good:

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested by the Constitution, and in the name of the sovereign people of the United States, do hereby proclaim and declare unconditionally, and without reservation, to all and to every person who directly or indirectly participated in the late insurrection or rebellion, a full pardon and amnesty for the offense of treason against the United States, or of adhering to their enemies during the late civil war, with restoration of all rights, privileges, and immunities under the Constitution and the laws which have been made in pursuance thereof.

In testimony whereof I have signed these presents with my hand, and have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Mr. MCRAE. There was no oath required by this. Construing these pardons the Supreme Court on the 30th day of April, 1870, in the case of Padelford, in 9 Wall., 531, held that participation in the late rebellion was no bar to a recovery. No proof of loyalty was necessary. Here is what it said.

The Clerk read:

In the case of Garland this court held the effect of a pardon to be such "that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense;" and in the case of Armstrong's foundry we held that the general pardon granted to him relieved him from a penalty which he had incurred to the United States.

As to the effect of the pardon the court said:

If, in other respects, the petitioner made the proof which under the act entitled him to a decree for the proceeds of his property, the law makes the proof of pardon a complete substitute for proof that he gave no aid or comfort to the rebellion. A different construction would, as it seems to us, defeat the manifest intent of the proclamation and of the act of Congress which authorized it. Under the proclamation and the act the Government is a trustee, holding the proceeds of the petitioner's property for his benefit; and having been fully reimbursed for all expenses incurred in that character, loses nothing by the judgment, which simply awards to the petitioner what is his own.

In the case of Klein, in 13 Wall., the same doctrine was announced and has since been adhered to. It is good law and common honesty, and he who is not willing to abide by it is not willing to do as he would be done by, in my opinion. The Clerk read:

Now it is clear that the Legislature can not change the effect of such a pardon any more than the Executive can change a law. Yet this is attempted by the provision under consideration. The court is required to receive special pardons as evidence of guilt, and to treat them as null and void. It is required to disregard pardons granted by proclamation on condition, though the condition has been fulfilled, and to deny them their legal effect. This certainly impairs the executive authority and directs the court to be instrumental to that end.

In the same opinion the doctrine announced in Padelford's case was reasserted with such force by the Chief-Justice that it ought to be regarded as settled. I make a few citations from it upon that point:

"1. That it was not the intention of Congress, by the enactment of that statute, that the title to property seized under it should be divested from the loyal owners.

"2. That the proceeds of the property should go into the Treasury without change of ownership.

"3. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal.

"4. That it was for the Government itself to determine whether those proceeds should be restored to the owner or not.

"5. That the President's proclamations of pardon and amnesty, with restoration of rights of property, and particularly that of July 4, 1868, was a decision on the part of the Government which decided affirmatively the right of all the owners of such property to the proceeds thereof in the Treasury; and the restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned.

"6. And that 'the Government constituted itself the trustee for those who by that act were declared entitled to the proceeds of captured and abandoned property, and for those whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled.'"

Continuing, the court say:

"That it was not the intention of Congress that the title to these proceeds should be divested absolutely out of the original owners of the property seems clear upon a comparison of different parts of the act."

And concludes with this strong language:

"The title to the proceeds of the property which came to the possession of the Government by capture or abandonment, with the exceptions already noticed, was in no case divested from the original owner. It was for the Government itself to determine whether these proceeds should be restored to the owner or not. The promise of the restoration of all rights of property decided that question affirmatively as to all persons who availed themselves of the proffered pardon. * * *

"The restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the persons pardoned on application within two years from the close of the war. It was, in fact, promised for an equivalent. 'Pardon and restoration of political rights' were 'in return' for the oath and its fulfillment.

"To refuse it would be a breach of faith not less cruel and astounding than to abandon the freed people whom the Executive had promised to maintain in their freedom."

This proclamation of President Johnson was simply in keeping with the policy inaugurated by President Lincoln, and was in the nature of a national contract. It has been so construed by the Supreme Court in various cases, beginning with that of Padelford. The people whose property was thus wrongfully seized and recklessly squandered have honestly and industriously performed their part of the contract, and it remains to be seen whether the Government as trustee will plead the statute of limitations against its own citizens. It ought not to do so. I do not think it can afford to say that it will. For a time it may do nothing, but in the end justice will be done to these worthy people, many of whom are widows and children of those brave and gallant men of the South who staked all they had on the issue of 1861 and lost.

This money either belongs to them or it belongs to the Government, and, as we have seen, over twenty millions of it has been disposed of, and some of it to people not entitled to it, in ways that, to say the least of them, are doubtful and suspicious. A clerk in the Treasury Department stated that the fund was "held by F. E. Spinner as special agent, and it was lying there loose, and whoever could rake up a little claim could get it."

One of the Secretaries of the Treasury, in his reports in relation to this fund, said:

While thus engaged in making collections of the aforesaid property contractors frequently seized the property of private individuals, who complained to the Department for redress, which upon clear proof was fully afforded.

The same official boasts that—in no case, however, it is believed, was the property or its proceeds restored to any unpardoned rebel.

So it has all gone to the loyal men and none to the rebels. Now, as far as my influence goes, and I hope this House will agree with me, I mean to see that the law as declared by the Supreme Court is enforced and the money paid to the people to whom it properly belongs, without reference to which side they were on in the late civil war. The Southern claimants shall be treated fairly or it shall remain in the Treasury of the United States. The Government, through a lot of mean agents and a regular system of pillage and plunder in time of peace, has robbed my constituents, but it shall not with my consent give the booty to a lot of camp followers and agents who if loyal have no scars to prove it.

Mr. OATES. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, when a bill similar to this was up a month or so ago, I took occasion to express my doubts about the principle involved and the method of dealing with the subject it presents, and I entertain the same views at this time. I shall now ask attention only to what I think is a misleading idea that is often expressed upon the floor of this House. We hear it said over and over again that all we are asking is to permit this man to go into the court, and that if we can trust the court what harm would be done? I say, Mr. Chairman, that that is essentially a misleading and deceptive opinion applied to a case like this. Here is a fund aggregating about $10,000,000 belonging to some person or persons.

The question is, how shall we discover the owners? Those gentlemen who would secure that fund, or any part of it, are inaugurating proceedings in the nature of proceedings in rem for the purpose of settling the ownership. But when we give a party a status in court without bringing in the adversary party we have no trial at all. It is a mere farce. A judgment in such a case would bind no adverse claimant. We may have a trial and an adjudication in favor of a claimant to-day, but to-morrow another claimant comes in and says "that was my property." He has as much right to be heard as the other, and the proceedings in the preceding case can not bar his right, as he was not a party to the litigation.

If we are to have an adjudication which is final, we must have all the adverse claimants present in court, so that it will bind all. Therefore I shall vote for such a bill as I have heretofore indicated. The bar of the statute of limitation should be removed for a period of one year, for instance, within which time all parties may come forward and file their claims, all claims not filed within that time to be forever barred. If for any part of the fund there shall appear more than one claimant, let them interplead, and then the judgment will bar all and settle the rights of all as against the Government and inter se. We shall then have a finality of these cases, because all parties to the claim will be present, and those who shall not have availed themselves of the privileges of the act will be forever barred. No lawyer certainly can doubt but that this is the only way in which this matter can be definitely settled.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. With a provision by which the rights of the Government will be thereafter forever protected against such claimants.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. The act should provide that all claims should be barred if not filed within a year, and that no judgment should be rendered until after that time. The proceeding here, however, in this bill is simply a proceeding in rem; one claimant present, all the rest absent. It would not bind any of the claimants who are not present.

Mr. SENEY. If the gentleman from Minnesota will allow me, I desire to say to him that there is a bill of the description he has indicated before the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. I shall not vote for any other kind of a bill.

Mr. SENEY. This is a bill to remove the statutory bar for one year.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. There are suspicious circumstances about this case that make me a little wary. I am not ready now, because I do not know enough about the facts to discuss it res adjudicata. I place my opposition on the grounds above stated.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am strongly of the opinion from the moral and presumptive evidence surrounding this case that the only parties in interest are masquerading under the name of this man Noble; that they are not presented in their proper person, but are seeking through him or in his name to have a hearing from the Government of the United States, and I can conceive it possible that he is interested only to the extent of some commission or compensation as an agent for the use of his name. I confess that is the general impression left upon my mind from such examination as I have been able to give to the case. I am equally of opinion that this money in the Treasury of the United States by the action of our Government and by the decision of our highest court belongs to individuals and not to the Government.

Why, sir, we are committed in honor and good faith to that principle on the highest possible sanction; the sanction of the Executive, the sanction of the courts, and the sanction of the Supreme Court.

Well, why do we not provide for the payment of this money to the actual owners of that fund under our law by the action of our Government? Because we can not do it now, as the question of loyalty is interjected into the case. What has that to do with it? The Supreme Court decided that that question does not arise at all. Then by law we are bound to pay it. But why do not claimants apply? Because they did not know the court would so decide. They were under the impression that the time had expired.

Now it will be but justice to the people of the United States, but it will not be done at this session, to pass a law providing justly for the distribution of this trust-money to the real parties owning the cotton.

Mr. OATES. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] suspects that there may be other parties from whom this cotton was bought who are the real claimants, but who are covering their disloyalty behind Noble. The question of disloyalty does not affect the status of any man before the courts of this country. The Supreme Court has decided in more than one case that the President's proclamation of amnesty and pardon restored all to their legal rights, and the question as to whether the man was disloyal or loyal cuts no figure in such a case.

It is only when we come to pass a bill here allowing the party to go before the Court of Claims that such provision is put in. Some gentleman always offers an amendment, which is adopted, that he shall establish his loyalty, when it should only be a question as to whether he is the real owner, and if he is he should have the right to go before the Court of Claims.

Now, no one has any right at all until there is a law which enables him to go before the Court of Claims. So that that amounts to nothing, and again I repeat that this bill requires Noble to prove his loyalty, to prove his ownership, and to trace the proceeds to the Treasury, and the bill, after the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] had been adopted, as any gentleman will see, whatever it is held he may be entitled to can only be obtained out of the proceeds of his cotton, not out of any other man's cotton. This is not a bill offered in which there are numerous claimants. There is some part of it, as my friend from Minnesota will find, if he gives an examination to the case, that belongs to this claimant.

Mr. SENEY. The gentleman from Alabama certainly does not wish to be understood as saying that Mr. Noble's is the only one of these cotton claims.

Mr. OATES. Oh, no; there are numerous claims. I had just said that these ten millions are held there as a fund to which there are numerous claimants; and where any claimant fails to show that the cotton was sold he can not recover unless he proves that the proceeds of his cotton were covered into the Treasury.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. What would there be to prevent any one else from proving that this property was his? Could not John Smith go in to-morrow and prove that it was his?

Mr. OATES. No man could get a judgment against the United States except in pursuance of a statute. We are only asking that Noble may have an opportunity to make the necessary proof, and it does not affect John Smith or Richard Roe. If it belonged to them they could make the proof.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. What right have we to legislate here in that way? If John Smith says it is his property, what right have we to refuse him an opportunity to go into court?

Mr. OATES. The gentleman seems to want to try the question here. All we ask is an opportunity to go into court.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. What right have we to refuse to let a man go there if he can prove that the property is his?

Mr. OATES. I will vote to give every man the opportunity to go there.

Mr. SENEY. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] allow me to ask him another question; whether it is not proposed either in this bill, or by the Senate bill, to make Samuel Noble a competent witness in his own case?

Mr. OATES. Is not that the general statute?

Mr. SENEY. I do not so understand.

Mr. OATES. Oh, yes.

Mr. SENEY. It may be so. That question was discussed here a few days ago, but I do not know what conclusion was reached. It certainly is the law in many of the States. But that does not answer my question. My question is whether the Senate bill or the pending bill does not provide that Mr. Noble shall be a witness in his own behalf?

Mr. OATES. Well, suppose he is?

Mr. SENEY. Then, is there any other proof needed by Mr. Noble, save and except his own testimony, to establish his case if he can get into the Court of Claims?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SENEY. Would not that be sufficient upon which to carry his case?

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Of course it would.

Mr. OATES. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that if he knew Samuel Noble as well as I and my colleagues know him, and if the gentleman were put into the jury-box, he would hang a man on Mr. Noble's evidence.

Mr. SENEY. Oh, that is not an argument. That does not answer my question.

Mr. OATES. You are supposing a case that does not exist.

Mr. SENEY. I am asking whether you do not propose by this bill to make him a competent witness, so that if he gets into the Court of Claims he can by his own oath carry his case through?

Mr. OATES. The court must require evidence that will satisfy them, and it is to be presumed they will do that. If my friend from Ohio was on the bench and the case was before him it would be for him to determine what evidence, whether it was Mr. Noble's or any other, would be sufficient. We do not undertake here to determine in advance what shall satisfy the conscience of the court.

Mr. SENEY. Well, I want to assert here upon my responsibility that I believe the purpose in view is simply to clothe Mr. Noble with the right to testify in his own behalf, so that upon his own naked, unsupported testimony he may carry his case through the Court of Claims and take this money out of the Treasury. That is the purpose of the whole bill, in my judgment.

Mr. OATES. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not at all responsible for the convictions of my friend from Ohio. He may feel that he has sufficient evidence to warrant that kind of a conclusion, but I do not know of any other gentleman who has reached the same conclusion. If he had looked into the proofs in this case he would not so conclude.

Mr. SENEY. Wait until the vote is taken and you will find that there are more who think as I do.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman, I undertake to say, has never looked into the proofs of this case, except what he has found in the report of the case as it was tried in 1875.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Was there any hearing before the Judiciary Committee, and did Mr. Noble produce any proof?

Mr. OATES. There was a stack of letters and papers as high as this book is long. I have made the report in two Congresses, after having looked carefully into the proofs and become familiar with the facts of the case.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is it not a fact that the amendment requiring Mr. Noble to prove his loyalty has been put upon the bill since it came from the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. OATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. That was not one of the requirements of the original bill as it came from the committee?

Mr. OATES. No, sir; because the general law does not require it. That was an amendment which was offered here by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. MASON. Is there any other claimant to this money?

Mr. OATES. This particular money?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. OATES. No, sir.

Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota. Nobody can tell yet.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] has produced a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in which the Secretary states that some other party or parties recovered a judgment for the proceeds of 203 bales of cotton, which he believes is part of this lot. That, however, is a question for the court to determine.

Mr. MASON. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. If it has been adjudged that that much of the cotton belongs to others, I take it for granted that the Court of Claims would not again render a judgment for that amount to be paid to Mr. Noble.

Mr. McCULLOGH. If, as the gentleman from Alabama states, there is a pile of testimony as high as the Revised Statutes are long, why must there be a special provision as to evidence in this case? Why not let it go to trial under the regular rules of evidence?

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman will submit an amendment to the bill suggesting any other course of proof, anything that will reach the truth, I will vote for it. The gentleman, however, must certainly be aware of the fact that the Court of Claims is not a common-law tribunal and has no common-law jurisdiction. It must proceed by virtue of a statute. Otherwise its judgment is a nullity.

Mr. McCULLOGH. If nothing is said in the bill, does not that court proceed by the common-law rules of evidence?

Mr. OATES. It has no jurisdiction of anything, except by virtue of a statute.

Mr. McCULLOGH. But after the jurisdiction is granted, do not the common-law rules of evidence obtain and prevail?

Mr. OATES. Oh, I presume so.

Mr. McCULLOGH. Then why put a special rule of evidence in this bill?

Mr. OATES. There is no special rule of evidence in the bill.

Mr. McCULLOGH. The claimant is made a witness.

Mr. OATES. What harm does that do? By virtue of the general statute he is a competent witness.

Mr. McCULLOGH. The question is not what harm it does. What better right has this man than any other to have this privilege?

Mr. OATES. If every man in the United States has a right to testify in his own behalf, does it add to or enlarge Noble's right to say, in an act authorizing him to go into court, that he shall be a competent witness?

Mr. STEWART, of Georgia. That provision was put upon the bill here, I believe?

Mr. SENEY. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the third Monday of December next. Is that motion in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair inclines to think it is.

Mr. OATES. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us take a vote on the merits of the matter now.

Mr. SENEY. If it is the purpose of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to move that the bill be laid aside to be favorably reported to the House, I will, on reflection, withdraw my motion, and join with him in securing the sense of the Committee of the Whole upon his proposition.

Mr. OATES. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will allow the substitute, which goes simply to the form of the bill, to be adopted, and then I will make the motion indicated.

Mr. SENEY. Does the gentleman mean the Senate substitute?

Mr. OATES. No, sir; I would not support the Senate substitute. The bill as referred to the Judiciary Committee of this House was not, in the opinion of that committee, in proper form; and they reported a substitute which I hope may be adopted before we take the question of laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The only proposition now before the committee is upon agreeing to the substitute as amended on motion of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Several MEMBERS. Let the substitute as amended be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That Samuel Noble, a citizen of the State of Alabama, may, notwithstanding the bar of the statute of limitation, or other legal impediment hitherto existing, prosecute his claim to the net proceeds of the sale of 802 bales of cotton, alleged to have been captured by the United States military authorities at Savannah, Ga., in December, 1864, before the Court of Claims, under the provisions of this act and "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned or captured property, and the prevention of frauds in the insurrectionary districts of the United States," approved March 12, 1863. But no judgment shall pass in favor of said Samuel Noble until his loyalty during the late war shall have been established to the satisfaction of the said court, and he shall have further proved that during said war he did not in any way afford aid or comfort to the late rebellion: Provided, That a greater amount of money shall not be paid in satisfaction of this claim than the amount actually received into the Treasury as net proceeds of the sale of the cotton alleged to have been taken.

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute as amended, it was agreed to.

Mr. OATES. I now move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House favorably.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—ayes 23, noes 66.

The CHAIRMAN. The effect of the action just taken is to leave the bill still on the Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. In view of this vote, I suggest that the measure had better be reported to the House with an adverse recommendation.

Mr. OATES. I am willing it should remain on the Calendar just as it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that it should stand in the way of other business. I move that it be reported to the House adversely.

Mr. OATES. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not insist if the bill goes to the foot of the Calendar.

Mr. SENEY. I renew the motion that the bill be reported to the House with an adverse recommendation.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it now in order to move as an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain that motion.

Mr. SENEY. I hope that motion will not prevail.

Mr. DUNN. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the recommitment of a bill is a function of the House itself, and the motion to recommit can be made in the House even after the previous question is ordered on a bill, but can not be made in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. This is simply a proposed recommendation of the Committee of the Whole to the House; of course the question will come up afterwards for the decision of the House itself.

Mr. DUNN. Is this a legitimate subject for the Committee of the Whole to make a report upon?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly it is.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] has moved that this bill be reported to the House with an adverse recommendation. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], as an amendment to that motion, moves that the bill be reported, not with an adverse recommendation, but with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SENEY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky for what reason he wants to send this matter back to the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. My answer to that question shall be perfectly frank. I make the motion for two reasons: First, to let the claim down as easily as I can without hurting anybody's feelings; in the second place, I think a good many members of the House are in the same position as myself; they could not quite see their way clear to vote for the bill, yet felt that it might be a just claim which upon further examination ought not to be rejected; therefore I want the bill to go back to the committee for re-examination.

Mr. OATES. I ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. SENEY] to withdraw his motion and let the bill remain on the Calendar.

Mr. SENEY. I desire that the House shall not be troubled with this bill further.

Mr. OATES. Why, you have won a good deal of glory in opposing it

Mr. SENEY. I want to move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky so as to provide that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN. The original motion of the gentleman from Ohio has that effect, and accomplishes all that could be accomplished in the way of killing the bill.

Mr. SENEY. Is it in order at this time to move to strike out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be if the other motion was not pending.

Mr. SENEY. Then I will withdraw my former motion, and move that this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out. It is suggested to me that that is the proper way to reach what I desire.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I would make the same amendment to that motion.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest that it be reported back with the recommendation that it be simply indefinitely postponed.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a proposition pending.

Mr. McCULLOGH. I wish to move a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. BRUMM. There is but one amendment pending, and that is the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves that this bill be reported back with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out. The gentleman from Kentucky moves as an amendment that it be reported back with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McCULLOGH. I wish to move that it be reported to the House with the recommendation to recommit it with instructions.

Mr. LANHAM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. In consequence of the difference of opinion that seems to exist as to the parliamentary procedure on this bill, is a motion that the committee rise in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. LANHAM. I make that motion.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is not the motion pending to report this bill back with an adverse recommendation?

The CHAIRMAN. But the motion of the gentleman from Texas takes precedence, being of higher privilege.

Mr. SENEY. Does the motion of the gentleman from Texas that the committee rise have precedence over the motion I made awhile ago?

The CHAIRMAN. It has preference; it is equivalent to a motion to adjourn, and is privileged over all other motions.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 32, noes 61.

So the committee refused to rise.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, the committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. SENEY that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out, there were on a division—ayes 61, noes 20.

Mr. OATES. No quorum.

Mr. SENEY. Now let us have two weeks' deadlock.

Mr. LANHAM. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BLOUNT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 53, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House now adjourn. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. BURROWS. This is pension night.

The motion to adjourn was rejected.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m. by Mr. MCMILLIN, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 20, 1888.

SIR: Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN is hereby designated to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

LOUISE PAUL.

Mr. LAFFOON. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the bill (S. 749) granting a pension to Louise Paul, reported from the Committee of the Whole favorably.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this bill has been reported from the Committee of the Whole and is now before the House. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? The Chair will state that this is a portion of the unfinished business on which the House was engaged on the 12th instant.

The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Louise Paul, widow of Brig. Gen. Gabriel R. Paul, United States Army, and to pay her a pension of $100 a month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill having been already passed to its engrossment and third reading, the question now is on its passage.

The bill was passed.

Mr. LAFFOON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for consideration of bills under the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that bills may be taken in their order upon the Calendar, beginning from the place where we left off on last Friday night, and as the bills are read by their title, if no one asks for their consideration, that they be informally passed over, retaining their places; with the reservation that if any bills have been passed over which gentlemen desire to call up during the evening they may be permitted to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

JOSEPH VERBISKY.

The first business on the Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (S. 2105) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Verbisky.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Verbisky, late of the Second Regiment United States Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions shows fully the facts in this case and the condition of the claimant. Your committee adopt that report and recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 892, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The claimant under this bill enlisted in the regular Army of the United States as a private in Company I, Second Regiment of Infantry, on the 8th day of October, 1851, and was honorably discharged January 18, 1853. He was pensioned October 8, 1853, from January 18, 1853, "for amputation of left arm and fracture of right wrist," which has been increased at sundry times until the present, and he is now in receipt of $36 per month. He made application for increase under the act of August 4, 1886, which was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions on the ground "that his arm was not amputated at the shoulder joint or so near the joint as to prevent the use of an artificial limb."

Assistant Surgeon C. Ewen, United States Army, certifies "that upon examination of claimant, he finds that he has lost his left arm at the elbow; the use of the right arm is impaired from a fracture of the ulna, and the arm is weak; there is great difficulty of speech (partial paralysis), apparently resulting from gunshot wound of head." Margaret J. Verbisky, wife of claimant, testifies "that for eleven years claimant has been helpless, unable to dress or feed himself; one side is paralyzed, and he has to be covered and turned over in bed; that he requires the constant care and attention of another person."

Henry Hamborg and Max Haselby swear that the claimant requires the help of his wife in dressing and washing himself, and in cutting his victuals. Under the statement of facts presented your committee are of the opinion that the claimant is very nearly totally disabled, and that if a rating was allowed for this disability to right arm, that the pension would exceed the amount proposed by the bill, and they therefore report the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHEADLE. Heretofore when a bill was called up for consideration I raised a point of order as to the presence of a quorum and it went over to a full House. Several bills have taken that course, as the committee will remember. My inquiry now is whether having gone over to be considered in a full House, such bills can be considered here at this session under this special order?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a matter for the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to determine.

Mr. CHEADLE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry as to the status of the bill when it is sent over to a full House under the special order, whether in the judgment of the Chair it can be taken up at this session or not?

The CHAIRMAN. No action can be taken here at this time, because the bill has already been considered in Committee of the Whole, and the present occupant of the chair is not the Speaker and he can not pass upon the question.

[Mr. CHEADLE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. GALLINGER. The gentleman is discussing a matter that occurred in the House, and I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The explanation was proceeding by unanimous consent, and the Chair thinks the gentleman will not detain the committee long.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to any further discussion of the case.

Mr. CHEADLE. I wanted to make this explanation, and I shall call for a quorum on all of these cases—every one of them.

Mr. FARQUHAR. There is nothing new in that expression of the gentleman.

NANCY BALDWIN.

The next business on the Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. HOVEY) was the bill (H. R. 4504) granting a pension to Nancy Baldwin.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy Baldwin, widow of Reuben Baldwin, deceased, late of Company B, Fifty-eighth Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4504) granting a pension to Nancy Baldwin, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Nancy Baldwin is the widow of Reuben Baldwin, deceased. She made application for pension as soldier's widow, and the same was rejected on the ground—

"That the disease of which the soldier died (typhoid fever) was not contracted in nor due to his military service, nor due to the hernia for which he was pensioned, said fever occurring six years after his discharge from the service."

The soldier was pensioned for inguinal hernia, which he contracted by falling through a bridge while on picket duty before Corinth, Miss., about May 6, 1862.

The examining surgeon, Dr. Hugh H. Patten, says:

"He finds hernia in left groin produced by a fall. The rupture is very large, and often very painful; it is several inches long. Soldier is unable to do any kind of labor; disability permanent, and in my opinion equivalent to an amputation."

Dr. J. A. Malone testifies that soldier came under his professional treatment (date not stated) suffering with inguinal hernia of right side.

"I thought there was ulceration in the bowels, for he sunk down suddenly shortly after the hernia made its appearance in the right side, and there was no time for a surgical operation, as death followed soon after, September 3, 1868."

In a later affidavit he testifies:

"The cause of his death September 3, 1868, was from typhoid fever and the inguinal hernia, of which he sunk suddenly before an operation could be had."

Two years later, August 19, 1879, Dr. Malone again testifies:

"That the prime cause of the soldier's death was inguinal hernia of the right side, causing perforation of the bowels. Typhoid fever was secondary to the above trouble. The inflammation of the hernia was made very active by the fever during the last two or three days of his sickness and he sank down and died on or about the 3d of September, 1868."

Dr. West testified that soldier never had but one hernia that he knows of, the one of which he died.

All the evidence tends to show, in the opinion of the committee, that the death of the soldier may reasonably be traced to the hernia contracted in the Army. True he might have died of typhoid fever had hernia not existed, but the medical testimony shows that death must have been produced by hernia and typhoid fever combined.

While there may be a doubt as to the actual cause of death, the committee are disposed to give the widow the benefit of the doubt, and therefore submit a favorable report, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES RITCHEY.

The next business on the Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. DUNHAM) was the bill (H. R. 5123) to increase the pension of Charles Ritchey.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the invalid pension-roll of the United States the name of Charles Ritchey, late a sergeant of Company K, Thirty-ninth Indiana Infantry Volunteers, at the increased rate of $72 per month, for the loss of both lower limbs.

SEC. 2. That such rate of pension shall commence from the date of his former application for increase made under the general pension laws, to wit: November 13, 1886.

The report (by Mr. LANE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5123) for the relief of Charles Ritchey, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

The record in this case shows that the soldier enlisted in the Army August, 1861, in the Thirty-ninth Regiment of Indiana Infantry Volunteers, and was honorably discharged therefrom in April, 1862, by the reason of disability incurred in the line of duty as a soldier, and that he is now drawing a pension of $16 per month for such disability, which is paralysis. He makes application now for an increase of his pension on the ground of total disability in the loss of both of his lower limbs, which occurred since he has been drawing his pension, by being run over by a railway engine while crossing the track, he being unable to get out of the way on account of the paralysis from which he was pensioned. His claim was rejected in the Pension Office on the ground that he was drawing all the law would allow for paralysis.

The committee find from the testimony in this case that it is reasonably certain that if the soldier was not suffering from paralysis he would not be injured by the engine aforesaid, and he being now totally incapacitated for any manual labor whatever, and is so helpless as to require the constant aid and attention of others.

The committee therefore recommend that said bill be amended by striking out the words "seventy-two," in the seventh line of the first section, and to insert in lieu thereof the word "forty," and to strike out all of section 2 of said bill, and that the bill so amended do pass.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is the second section the section which gives arrears?

Mr. DUNHAM. Yes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is all right.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

A. F. SAINT SURE LINDEFELT.

The next business on the Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. HUDD) was the bill (H. R. 3055) for the relief of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to hear and determine the claim of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt, late surgeon of the Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, for pension, and, upon proper case made, to pension him the same as if he had been regularly mustered as assistant surgeon of the Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers, May 1, 1862.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1151) for the relief of the legal representatives of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt, submit the following report:

This bill in substance was reported from the Military Committee in the House of Representatives for the Forty-ninth Congress. General Bragg, chairman of said Military Committee, made the report thereon, which is hereto annexed and made part of this report.

[House Report No. 4049, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.]

The committee have carefully considered this bill, and have procured from the office of the Adjutant-General a mass of testimony concerning this officer, which is hereto appended and made part of this report.

There is no doubt that service was done by the officer, who seems to have occupied the anomalous position of an assistant surgeon with troops in the field, but a portion of the time being a supernumerary, acting under a State commission and being under pay of the State of Wisconsin, while subject to the orders and direction of officers commanding troops who were regularly enlisted and mustered into the service of the United States.

There appears to be nothing in his record which would warrant the committee to authorize at this late day his muster under his supernumerary commission, and thereby give him a claim for pay as an officer against the United States. But it has been brought to the notice of the committee, by the record in the Pension Office, that this person, while so acting under Federal authority, irregularly, it is true, sustained some severe injuries which are pensionable had they been sustained by an officer regularly mustered. Your committee, having the subject of his relief regularly before them by the bill referred to, feel justified in disposing of the whole subject without putting the claimant to the delay and trouble of waiting the action of a subsequent Congress on another bill. They therefore recommend that this bill do lie upon the table, and report as a substitute therefor the following bill, which it is recommended do pass:

A bill for the relief of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to hear and determine the claim of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt, late a surgeon of the Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, for pension, and upon proper case made to pension him the same as if he had been regularly mustered as assistant surgeon of the Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers, May 1, 1862.

The following is the evidence from the office of the Adjutant-General referred to in the former part of the report:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
February 5, 1887.

The SECRETARY OF WAR:

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith House bill No. 8282, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, "directing the Secretary of War to correct the muster-roll of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt, late surgeon of the Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, so as to include September 28, 1861, the date at which he was enrolled and commissioned by Governor Randall as second assistant surgeon of the Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers," and to report as follows:

The records of this office fail to furnish any evidence of service rendered by A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt as a medical officer of the Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers, his name failing to appear on any of the duly certified muster-rolls of that organization.

There is on file, however, a muster-in-roll of him as assistant surgeon Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers, which reports him "joined for duty and enrolled May 1, 1862, at Weston, Mo., and mustered in November 18, 1862, at Louisville, Ky., to date from September 30, 1862, for three years, commissioned by Governor Randall, September 30, 1862."

Attached to this roll is a note and an order, of which the following are copies:

BARDSTOWN, KY., November 16, 1862.

Asst. Surg. A. F. St. Sure Lindefelt will proceed to Louisville, Ky., for the purpose of being mustered into the service of the United States Volunteers, and return to this post without unnecessary delay.

W. H. NEWMAN
In charge hospital, N. Bardstown, Ky.

[Special Orders No. 135.]
[Extract.]

2. Asst. Surg. A. F. St. Sure Lindefelt, Eighth Battery Wisconsin Volunteers, and mustered into Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers, September 30, 1862, is hereby mustered out of service from date of muster-in, he having been irregularly commissioned and mustered, there being no place provided by law for him.

By order of the Secretary of War.

L. THOMAS, Adjutant-General.

VI. Assistant State Surgeon St. Sure Lindefelt, Twelfth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, is hereby relieved from duty with the paymaster's escort to New Mexico, and assigned to duty with the Eighth Wisconsin Battery.

* * * * * * *

By order of Brigadier-General Mitchell, commanding.

JNO. PRATT,
First Lieutenant, Second Kansas Volunteers, A. D. C. and A. A. A. G.

In March, 1863, Dr. Lindefelt applied to the Department for recognition as surgeon of the Eighth Battery Wisconsin Light Artillery Volunteers, and submitted a commission issued to him by Governor Solomon, as of said grade and battery, dated June 4, 1862, to take rank from May 26, 1862.

This application was not favorably entertained, for the reason that an independent battery of artillery was not, under the laws and regulations of the Army, entitled to a medical officer.

On March 23, 1863, a letter from this officer was forwarded to the commanding general Department of the Ohio, inclosing a copy of Special Orders No. 135, War Department, Adjutant-General's Office, series of 1863, mustering out of service Assistant Surgeon Lindefelt, and requesting to know who was responsible for keeping this supernumerary officer in service in violation of General Orders No. 126, of 1862.

The following letter was received in response thereto:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE CUMBERLAND,
Murfreesborough, April 19, 1863.

GENERAL: In answer to an inquiry from your office as to who is responsible for keeping Assistant Surgeon Lindefelt, Eighth Battery Wisconsin Volunteers, in service, in violation of General Orders 126, of 1862, I have the honor to state that it appears from the inclosed papers that Assistant Surgeon Lindefelt has been a surgeon under the orders and pay of the State, and that it was not intended he should be mustered into service.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. S. ROSECRANS,
Major-General, Commanding.

Brig. Gen. L. THOMAS,
Adjutant-General, U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

The inclosures referred to by General Rosecrans are as follows:

HEADQUARTERS EIGHTH WISCONSIN BATTERY,
THIRD BRIGADE, FIRST DIVISION, TWENTIETH ARMY CORPS,
Camp near Murfreesborough, April 14, 1863.

ADJUTANT: I have the honor to report, in obedience to indorsement on Special Order No. 135, War Department, Dr. A. F. St. Sure Lindefelt was assigned to duty in this command (by) Special Order No. 70, Wisconsin State department, a certified copy of which I have the honor to inclose. Assistant Surgeon Lindefelt was left sick at hospital, Bardstown, Ky., October 4, 1862; was afterwards detailed in charge of that hospital, and has not been with this command since that date. He has never been carried on any muster-rolls of this command, but on the muster-roll of hospital. All of which is respectfully submitted.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. E. STILES,
Captain, Commanding Eighth Wisconsin Battery.

ASSISTANT ADJUTANT-GENERAL,
Department Cumberland.

[Special Order No. 70.]

ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Madison, Wis., June 4, 1864.

Dr. A. Saint Sure Lindefelt is hereby transferred from the position of State surgeon of the Twelfth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers to the same post in the Eighth Battery Wisconsin Artillery, Captain Carpenter commanding, said transfer to take effect from May 26, 1862.

By order of commander-in-chief.

AUG. GAYLORD, Adjutant-General.

By a letter from this office dated April 29, 1863, General Rosecrans was directed by the Secretary of War to cause Dr. Lindefelt to cease doing any duty in the Department of the Cumberland.

Dr. Lindefelt joined for duty, and was mustered into service as surgeon, Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, on December 6, 1863, and is borne as of that grade in said regiment to date of his discharge, February 10, 1865.

The foregoing embraces all the information afforded by the records of this office relative to the services of Dr. Lindefelt.

The records of the Surgeon-General's Office report him as follows:

"Dr. A. F. St. Sure Lindefelt entered into contract with Brig. Gen. R. B. Mitchell, at Fort Riley, Kans., May 16, 1862, for duty as acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, with Seventh Kansas Volunteers. No reports of service nor date of enrollment appears. He is next reported on returns of medical officers serving with right wing Fourteenth Army Corps for November, 1862, on duty with Eighth Wisconsin Battery. Remarks: 'Left at Bardstown sick October 5, and in charge of hospital No. 1.' He is next reported on returns, Department of the Cumberland, for January, 1863, with Eighth Wisconsin Battery, Twentieth Army Corps, 'sick at Bardstown, Ky., October 15, 1862;' on returns, Department of the Ohio, from February to October, 1863, as assistant surgeon Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers, with regiment at Bardstown, Ky., except from March, 1863, when he is reported as on duty at hospital, Bardstown, Ky., and as belonging to Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, a pencil-mark having been drawn through Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers."

He is also reported from July to November, 1863, inclusive, as acting assistant surgeon with Eighth Wisconsin Battery.

In a letter to this office dated January 15, 1887, the adjutant-general of Wisconsin states that the records of his office show that Dr. Lindefelt was commissioned assistant surgeon Twelfth Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, September 30, 1861, to rank from September 28, 1861, and that he has paid by the State, as such, the sum of $196.40 on account of pay, subsistence, forage, and clothing to cover period September 28, 1861, to November 15, 1861, and that he was transferred from the position of State surgeon of the Twelfth Regiment to same post in Eighth Battery to date May 26, 1862, by special (State) order No. 70, dated June 4, 1862.

Dr. Lindefelt was paid as assistant surgeon Twelfth Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, from July 2, 1862, to April 30, 1863, both dates inclusive.

On his first voucher to February 28, 1863, he certifies that he is on detached service, by order of Brig. Gen. Robert B. Mitchell, Major Holbrook, paymaster, certifying that he has seen the order, and noted the payment thereon. On his voucher for March and April, 1863, he certifies that he was detailed to Bardstown hospital, Kentucky, in October, 1862, by order of General R. B. Mitchell; Maj. Jacob A. Camp, paymaster, certifies that he has seen the order, and noted the payment thereon.

From the foregoing it will be seen that Dr. Lindefelt, prior to muster as surgeon Fifteenth Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, was regarded as under the entire direction and control of the State of Wisconsin.

That he considered himself as in the service of the State and not of the General Government is evidenced by the fact that from and after April 30, 1863, to date of his muster into service as surgeon Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, December 6, 1863, he continued to perform the duties of a medical officer in violation of the orders of the Secretary of War.

The position he held as a medical officer was anomalous. He appears to have been paid as assistant surgeon Twelfth Wisconsin Volunteers for services rendered as a surgeon of an independent battery of artillery, an organization that was not entitled under the laws to a medical officer of any grade.

There is nothing of record in the Department to sustain the action proposed by this bill.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. C. KELTON,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 12, 1887.

SIR: In accordance with your request I have the honor to inclose herewith a report of the Adjutant-General of yesterday's date, relative to House bill No. 8282, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, for the relief of A. F. S. S. Lindefelt, late of the Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers. From this report it will be seen that it can not be established from the records of the Adjutant-General's Office alone whether this person is entitled to further recognition under the provisions of the act approved June 3, 1884, and that a prompt report in the case will be made as soon as data is received from the adjutant-general of the State of Wisconsin, who has been communicated with.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. E. S. BRAGG,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 12, 1887.

SIR: Referring to House bill No. 8282, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, for the relief of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt, late of the Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers, submitted by Hon. E. S. Bragg, chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives, with request for information relative thereto, I have the honor to report that it can not be definitely determined from the records of this office alone whether or not this officer is entitled to further recognition under the provisions of the act approved June 3, 1884.

A letter calling for more specific data has this day been forwarded to the adjutant-general of Wisconsin, and as soon as a reply has been received thereto a prompt report will be made in the case.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. C. DRUM,
Adjutant-General.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, February 8, 1887.

SIR: In connection with previous correspondence on the subject, I have now the honor to inclose a report of the 5th instant, from the Adjutant-General's Office, which affords the information requested by you on House bill 8282, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, providing for the relief of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt, late surgeon of the Fifteenth Wisconsin Volunteers.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM C. ENDICOTT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. E. S. BRAGG,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

Therefore your committee recommend that the bill do pass.

During the reading of the report

Mr. FARQUHAR said: I move to dispense with the reading of the transcript of the evidence from the office of the Adjutant-General, and that it be printed with the report.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPH WIRTH.

Mr. MCKINNEY. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 2033) granting a pension to Joseph Wirth; which has heretofore been passed over. It is on page 62 of the Calendar.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Wirth, late quartermaster-sergeant in Company L, Third New Jersey Cavalry, and pay him at the rate of $30 per month, from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2033) granting a pension to Joseph Wirth, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

Joseph Wirth is a pensioner at $24 a month, under the first clause of the act of March 3, 1883, which provides that all persons who "shall have lost one hand or one foot, or been totally or permanently disabled in the same, or otherwise so disabled as to render their incapacity to perform manual labor equivalent to the loss of a hand or foot, shall receive a pension of $24 per month."

The disability for which the pensioner was awarded this pension is a gunshot wound in the right hand.

The last board examination is as follows:

"The wrist is completely anchylosed, with considerable deformity, partial anchylosis of metacarpophalangian articulation of thumb. Other joints are not anchylosed, but he is unable to flex fingers in palm; has very little motion in little and ring fingers; middle and index fingers can be flexed about one-half; can approximate thumb and index finger, and can make some use of hand in eating and writing. He is, in our opinion, entitled to a third-grade rating for the disability caused by gunshot wound of right hand, and total for that caused by piles, and one-quarter caused by exostosis and fracture of ribs."

By reason of the wound of right hand pensioner is totally disqualified for the pursuit of his occupation, that of draughtsman and civil engineer, in which capacity he was employed a part of the period of his service.

In addition to this disability he alleges injury to side and leg, and piles. These disabilities are not established to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau, and, as appears in letter from that Bureau to Senator HEARST, if established, would not increase the present rate of pension. There is record of the injury to side, and a rating therefor is made by the board of medical examiners.

While it is true that the act of August 4, 1886, does not provide an increase for a disability equivalent to the loss of a hand, and therefore the Pension Bureau is estopped from granting an increase, unless the hand is totally disabled, which the medical referee does not concede, yet your committee are of opinion that inasmuch as the usefulness of the hand has been entirely destroyed for the purposes of claimant's occupation, and as he is suffering from other disabilities, as above stated, the relief asked for should be granted, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill, and ask that it do pass, amended, however, by inserting after the word "act," in line 6, the words "in lieu of the pension now received by him."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ENOCH G. ADAMS.

Mr. HERMANN. I ask consideration of the bill (S. 692) granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams, which has been heretofore passed over. It is on page 62 of the Calendar.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Enoch G. Adams, late captain of Company D, First Regiment United States Infantry, at the rate of $24 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving, to commence from the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 692) granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

The report of the Senate Committee on Pensions is as follows:

"Enoch G. Adams was wounded in the line of duty while sergeant of Company D, Second Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers.

"His wound was in the left side of the neck, causing nervous derangement. He was pensioned at the rate of $4 a month, commencing March 4, 1878; at $8 per month commencing April 13, 1878; at $16 per month commencing May 28, 1886.

"An examination of the soldier was made by a board of examiners on May 26, 1886, and in their judgment, giving to the applicant the benefit of every doubt, they were of the opinion that 'his disability equaled one-third grade rating, equal to loss of a hand or foot.'

"In addition to the ordinary report made by the board of examiners they forwarded a letter to the Pension Bureau, signed by all the members of the board, giving more fully their views of the condition of the petitioner. In addition to this, there is testimony in the papers, satisfactory to the minds of your committee, showing that the petitioner's mind has been seriously affected, whether from the fact of his wound or not the examining board express themselves as unable to decide with certainty, holding that this question can only be satisfactorily ascertained by a post mortem examination. As that can not take place until after the death of the petitioner, the committee is of the opinion that they should give to the applicant the benefit of the doubt, as suggested by the board of examiners, and rate him, as recommended in their report, as though he had lost a hand or a foot. This rating would give him a pension of $24 per month.

"The committee would recommend that Senate bill 692 be amended in the seventh line by striking out the word seventy-two and inserting in lieu thereof the word twenty-four, and as so amended would recommend that the bill do pass.

"The committee further recommend that Senate bill 696, for the relief of the same soldier, and which must have been introduced through some mistake, be indefinitely postponed."

Your committee have carefully examined the papers in the case and wish to add the following additional statements:

The pensioner served from May 25, 1861, to November 27, 1865, when mustered out as captain of Company D, First United States Volunteers.

The description of the wound is as follows: Scar, lineal in character, vertically about a quarter of an inch long on left side of neck, about midway between lobe of left ear and center line of spine. Two small scars, about 2 inches lower down and nearer the spine, each about a third of an inch in diameter, and nearly round. Claims that the missile has not been removed. Board of examining surgeons say: "Pensioner appears to be very much depressed in spirits, and his appearance is that of poor health. He flinches upon pressure over clavicle and dorsal vertebræ. Heart's action irregular. His mental condition is such as to unfit him for transaction of business. If there is no missile there the wounds are trivial, but as the presence of a foreign body might account for the various nervous manifestations of which he complains, the board give him the benefit of the doubt and rate his disability as equal to the loss of a hand or foot."

As far back as April, 1878, an examining surgeon certifies that the wound has evidently affected pensioner's mental condition, and from information obtained is convinced that he is incapable of performing any manual labor.

The evidence clearly shows that the disability in the case is greater than recognized by the Pension Office, and your committee can discover no good reason why the rating made by the examining surgeons should be ignored by the Pension Bureau simply because there is doubt about the presence of a foreign body near the spine. If there is not, why recognize a part of the nervous derangement to the otherwise slight gunshot wound of left side of neck, and not all the disability shown by the medical examination?

Your committee are of opinion that pensioner is entitled to the rating fixed in the bill, and therefore return the same with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GUSTAVE E. PETERS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. MORRILL) was the bill (S. 2652) granting a pension to Gustave E. Peters.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Gustave E. Peters, late of Company K, Twenty-ninth Michigan Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2652) granting a pension to Gustave E. Peters, submit the following report:

The facts in this case are fully set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is hereto attached.

There seems to be no reason for doubting the incurrence of the disability in the service, and your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 917, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

This claimant enlisted September 4, 1864, as a private in Company K, Twenty-ninth Michigan Volunteers, and served until September 6, 1865. His application was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that his disabilities, double inguinal hernia, wound of left leg, etc., were not connected with his military service by competent testimony.

The claimant alleges that during the latter part of November, 1864, while on a night march, he fell into a ditch and was ruptured on the left side; and that in April, 1865, he was ruptured on the other side by falling, with a number of his comrades, through a rotten bridge, and being precipitated onto the rocks below. He also alleges gunshot wounds of the head and left leg, and bayonet wound of right hand.

John Flake, a comrade of claimant, testifies that he was marching behind him one night in November, 1864, and that claimant fell into a ditch; he did not see him fall, but did help him out; after daylight claimant showed him where he had been ruptured, on the left side; as he remembers it the rupture was then about the size of his fist. Flake also testifies that he recollects indistinctly claimant's subsequently being ruptured on the other side.

The surgeon of the regiment, Dr. Elmore Palmer, says he has "a faint recollection that Peters was ruptured while scouting for bushwhackers, some time in the spring of 1865."

John Land and Charles Peterson, comrades of Peters, testify to having known claimant well before and after enlistment (in Sweden and America), and to Peters having been "sound in limb and body" prior to the receipt of the injuries above mentioned. Isaac A. Wohlstrom, another comrade, testifies that Peters was entirely free from hernia at enlistment; that he knew the said injury of November, 1864, was incurred in line of duty, and that he knew of claimant receiving medical attention therefor.

Axel Tillstrom, another comrade, who knew claimant before coming to America, testifies that claimant was healthy at enlistment, and found fit for service on examination at that time. Peters showed him his rupture, incurred in November, 1864, and Tillstrom says it was about the size of a walnut. He also testifies as to claimant's incurring a second rupture, while pursuing bushwhackers, by falling through a rotten bridge. He also saw this rupture; he knew of Peters getting a truss from the surgeon; after their discharge he went with claimant to buy a second truss; claimant did not go to hospital, for he was a good soldier, and the captain, with whom he was a favorite, made his duties easy for him.

Peters is now sixty-four years old; his double hernia is so severe as to preclude his earning a living by manual labor, and he is a worthy object of relief. His soundness at enlistment is shown; his disability at discharge is also shown, and your committee draw only a reasonable conclusion when they presume that the disability was incurred in line of duty.

The passage of the bill reported herewith is recommended.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ERASTUS B. BURNHAM.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar called up for consideration was the bill (S. 1629) granting a pension to Erastus B. Burnham.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Erastus B. Burnham, late a member of Company F, Fifty-second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. FRENCH) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1629) granting a pension to Erastus B. Burnham, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

The facts in the case are set forth in the report of the Committee on Pensions, United States Senate, which is as follows:

"Erastus B. Burnham was mustered into the service on the 11th day of September, 1862, as private in Company F of the Fifty-second Massachusetts Volunteers, and remained until the 14th August, 1863, when he was discharged. During such service, in February, 1863, after he had contracted measles, he was placed on picket duty, and kept on such duty for three days and two nights, of which a part was spent in a rain storm, resulting in a serious sickness, the effects of which have impaired his health from that time to the present. Upon these facts he based an application for a pension.

"Examinations before medical boards have failed to establish disability to a pensionable degree as resulting from the attack of measles, while in different respects such boards have conceded greater or less disability from causes which they were unable to connect with his army service. Their reports have therefore been against the allowance of a pension, and his claim stands rejected in the Pension Office.

"Testimony of a different character is filed in the case from Dr. Pease, of claimant's town, his family physician and neighbor, who testifies, on the 28th day of July, 1884:

"'That he has been acquainted with said soldier for about twenty-three years, and that he knew him before he enlisted; that he was a sound, healthy man; that he knew him to be such; that immediately on his return after being discharged from the United States service, in August, 1863, was called to render him medical treatment. Found him suffering from a complication of diseases, resulting from an aggravated case of measles and the hardships and exposures of the camp. There was great prostration and debility; there was also much gastric and intestinal disease and derangement of the liver. Chronic diarrhea was a very obstinate and troublesome complication in his case. He was for a long time in a low, feeble condition, requiring constant and close medical attendance. He has been a confirmed invalid from the time of his discharge to the present.'

"Dr. E. C. Coy testifies, on the 23d November, 1886:

"'Have been acquainted with said soldier for about seven or eight years, and that on the 1st of March, 1885, he called on me at my office. I found him suffering great pain and weakness in lower or lumbar portion of his back, an enfeebled digestion, also a low and demoralized condition of the blood, and a worn and haggard countenance, as of one who had suffered much pain. From that time to the present I have seen and prescribed for him as often as two or three times a month, and I can not see that his condition has improved, but remains about the same. He has been disabled from manual labor a greater part of the time.'

"Dr. A. V. Bowker testifies, on the 7th June, 1887, to treating claimant for disease of the eyes, which had not been able to bear the light for six weeks, and which had not permitted him to read evenings for a year; and mentions other indications of weakness which need not be repeated here.

"There is also the testimony of a number of the immediate neighbors of the claimant, farmers, and most of whom have known him from boyhood, who agree in testifying that he was a sound, rugged man before enlistment; that he returned from the service broken down; that he has since continued an invalid; and rating his disability at from one-half to three-quarters.

"It is impossible to disregard the force of disinterested testimony of this character, from reputable physicians and neighbors, whose knowledge, taken together, covers the whole period of claimant's life. Whatever differences may exist as to particular diseases, and the date and proximate cause of their development, it would appear that there can be no doubt as to the general facts that claimant entered the Army as a strong man, that he came out of it a weak man, and that he has remained a sick man ever since.

"Your committee recommend the passage of the bill."

It may be added that the testimony of the regimental surgeon, based upon records in his possession, shows that claimant was treated for measles in February, 1863; for diarrhea in July, 1863; and for some other trouble, nature not stated, in the latter part of said month. One medical examination revealed disease of heart; another, disease of kidneys; while the personal description of claimant at every one of these examinations points to a much debilitated system.

The committee are clearly of opinion that this condition is due to the claimant's military service, and that he should be pensioned for the diseases shown to exist by the medical examinations heretofore referred to, and therefore report favorably on the accompanying bill and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EDWIN J. GODFREY.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. MCKINNEY) was the bill (H. R. 9366) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edwin J. Godfrey, late of Company B, Second New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey, having considered the same, report as follows:

Claimant was a private in Company B, Second New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry. He enlisted in May, 1861, and was discharged August, 1861, for disability (heart disease), which the regimental surgeon said existed prior to enlistment. Soldier, on the other hand, claims that the heart trouble was induced by fatigue and overheating at the first battle of Bull Run. The rolls show him to have been in battle at Bull Run July 21, 1861, and also his discharge as above. On the point of prior soundness soldier furnishes the affidavits of several reputable witnesses, all of whom swear that they knew him intimately before enlistment, and never heard him complain of any heart trouble, and the examining surgeon before whom he appeared for examination for pension says that—

"From his present condition and from the evidence before me it is my belief that the said disability did wholly originate in the service and in the line of duty."

The rejection of the claim was based wholly on the surgeon's certificate of discharge, no other witness swearing to the existence of the disease prior to enlistment.

Claimant is indorsed by the leading citizens of his town as a man of high integrity and incapable of a fraud upon the Government.

Every medical man knows that heart disease frequently follows undue exertion, caused probably by local congestions. This soldier could certainly have contracted the disease in the manner alleged, and in the absence of proof to the contrary it is presumable that he did. The opinion of the regimental surgeon is not entitled to much weight as proof, it being a well-known fact that no physician can possibly tell by a physical examination how long or how short a period a disease of that kind has existed.

Believing that the equities in the case are strongly in favor of the soldier, your committee report the bill back favorably and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MERCY A. CUTTS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask consideration of a bill heretofore passed over (S. 888), granting a pension to Mercy A. Cutts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mercy A. Cutts, mother of Enoch F. Cutts, deceased, late of Company A, Thirty-first Maine Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 888) granting a pension to Mercy A. Cutts, having considered the same, report as follows:

The Senate report fully explains the merits of the case, and is herewith appended:

"The claimant petitions for a special act granting her a pension as the mother of Enoch F. Cutts, who was a private in Company A, Thirty-first Regiment of Maine Volunteers. He enlisted, as shown by the report of the Adjutant-General, on the 29th of February, 1864, and died while a prisoner of war at Danville, Va., February 15, 1865. The father made application for a pension in 1867, and filed evidence in support of his claim. The file does not show any action by the Pension Office, except the indorsement of the single word 'Rejected.' The Pension Office letter transmitting the papers says no application for a pension has been filed by the mother. Referring to the father's application, it says it was rejected 'on the ground that he was only an adopted son.'

"The evidence shows that Enoch F. Cutts was adopted by Enoch B. Cutts and his wife, Mercy A. Cutts, when he was an infant one year old; that he took their name of Cutts and was called Enoch, after the father; that he was brought up as their child; that the obligations incurred by the relationship were mutually observed; that before he enlisted he gave them his earnings; that after he enlisted he contributed to their support liberally from his army pay. On this point there are numerous letters from the son. One of these letters only is quoted to show how he regarded the relationship. He says:

"DEAR PARENTS: I wrote home over a week ago and have received no answer, and now I will try it again. I don't find any fault, you know, for if father was home he would write. I am afraid you are sick and can't write. Charlie got a letter a day or two ago and said you was some better. I hope you are quite smart now. I am quite anxious to hear from home, and so you must contrive to write as soon as you receive this, or get Florence to. * * * I sent home $65 in care of L. D. Andrews. I should have sent more, but I used some. * * * Tell father not to work too hard.

"I remain, as ever, your affectionate son,

"ENOCH F. CUTTS.

"There can be no question as to the relationship legally and as recognized by the parties. It is shown that the father, on account of his infirmities, needed and was entitled to the pension for which he applied.

"The mother, having knowledge of the grounds of rejection of her husband's claim, made no application to the Pension Office, but appeals to Congress. Her petition describes the relationship, and it is supplemented by an appeal from numerous neighbors, who describe her worthiness, her advanced age, and consequent need.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

Your committee adopt the report of the Senate committee as its own, and recommend the passage of the bill, after being amended by adding, before the word "mother," in the fourth line, the word "foster," and also by striking out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and adding at the end of the bill the words "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month."

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES HALE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (S. 734) granting a pension to James Hale.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Hale, Company F, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 734) granting a pension to James Hale, having considered the same, report as follows:

The report of the Senate committee fully sets forth the facts in this case, which report your committee adopt as their own and recommend the passage of the bill, amended by adding at the end of the bill, after the word "artillery," the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that which he is now receiving."

The soldier enlisted August 29, 1864, and was mustered out May 16, 1865. He applied for a pension January 13, 1882, on account of disease of lungs, double inguinal hernia, and malarial poisoning.

A certificate was issued August 23, 1886, allowing him $4 a month for disease of lungs. The claim for hernia was rejected for want of sufficient evidence connecting the same with the service.

There is abundant proof of the facts that the soldier was a sound man when he entered the service, that he contracted disease of the lungs while in the service, for which he is receiving but $4 per month, and that very soon after he was mustered out he was afflicted with double hernia.

James B. Greeley, late surgeon of the First Rhode Island Cavalry, swears as follows:

That he has been acquainted with claimant for forty years, and knows that previous to his enlistment he was a sound and healthy man, and he was always a hard-working, robust man, and that after his return home from the service in the summer of 1867 he treated claimant for hernia, and at that time furnished and fitted claimant with a double truss. And further, that he has seen claimant at short intervals during each year since to the present time and knows that he has continually suffered from hernia.

Oliver B. Green swears:

"That he has known the claimant twenty-five years, and knows that at the time he returned home from the Army in 1865 claimant was suffering from double inguinal hernia, and constantly suffered from said disability until the summer of 1867, when his hernia was somewhat reduced by Dr. James B. Greeley, with a double truss, and, further, that said hernia has got to be so bad that claimant is now wholly disqualified for the performance of any manual labor. Affiant further says that he knows these facts of his own personal knowledge and observation and from often having seen claimant's hernia, and has heard him constantly complaining of his hernia, and from having seen claimant two or three times each week from his discharge up to the present time."

James W. Blood swears:

"That he has known claimant for thirty years, and knows that at the time of claimant's enlistment he was a sound and rugged man and free from any disease whatever; and that at the time of claimant's discharge and return home from the Army he was suffering with hernia on both sides and has constantly suffered from said disability. It has grown much worse each year, until he is at present wholly disqualified for the performance of manual labor. And further, that during the time from his discharge to the summer of 1867 he saw claimant frequently and often heard him complain of his hernia, and at different times saw the same; and that in the summer of 1867 Dr. James B. Greeley, of Thornton's Ferry, N. H., reduced the hernia and fitted him with a truss."

Claimant swears:

"I first became aware of my hernia while in hospital at Manchester, N. H., before my discharge. No commissioned officer or orderly sergeant of my company was there, nor enlisted men, nor surgeon or assistant surgeon of my regiment, and my hernia could not have been within their knowledge.

"The hernia was brought on by coughing, as I understand, and I showed it to Dr. Webster, who was in charge of the hospital, and he thought it would not amount to much. I understand he is dead. Dr. Eaton, who attended me the next day after my discharge, is also dead."

Two medical examining boards have rated claimant's disability at $4 for lung disease and $12 for hernia.

In view of all the evidence your committee think this is a just claim, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA A. WILLIAMSON.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. JOHN R. BROWN) was the bill (H. R. 9672) granting a pension to Eliza A. Williamson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Eliza A. Williamson, widow of Eustace Hunt, an ensign in Fifth Regiment Virginia Militia, who served in the Army of the United States in the war of 1812, notwithstanding her marriage to George Williamson, now deceased about thirty-two years.

The report (by Mr. HENDERSON, of North Carolina) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza A. Williamson, submit the following report:

Mrs. Eliza A. Williamson is an old lady in greatly reduced circumstances. She has now been a widow about thirty-two years. Her first husband, Eustace Hunt, was an ensign in the Fifth Regiment Virginia Militia, who served in the war of 1812. But for her second marriage to her late husband, George Williamson, she would be entitled to a pension under the general law.

Your committee think, under all the circumstances, that Mrs. Williamson's name should be placed upon the pension-roll, and therefore recommend the adoption of the accompanying substitute, and that the original bill (H. R. 6494) lie on the table.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARY L. RISTINE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. GEAR) was the bill (S. 1867) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary L. Ristine.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Mary L. Ristine, widow of Barnett E. Ristine, late a member of Company F of the Third Regiment of Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1867) granting a pension to Mary L. Ristine, respectfully report:

That they adopt the following Senate report as their own, and recommend the passage of the bill:

[Senate Report No. 795, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The claimant is the widow of Barnett E. Ristine, who was a private in Company F, Third Iowa Cavalry. He was pensioned for a gunshot wound in left elbow in 1866, and his pension was subsequently increased to $15 and again to $24 a month.

From the history of the case it appears that his was a painful and distressing disability. The wound caused him constant suffering, frequently discharged, and severely taxed his physical endurance. In 1885 he met with an accident which was in the nature of a compound fracture of his ankle. Mortification set in the third day after this injury and he died the fourth.

The widow filed a claim for pension, and alleged that "for a long time her husband had been suffering from blood poison, resulting from the gunshot wound of his left elbow; his general health had been very poor, and in consequence his friends think he could have lived but a short time. On the 3d of September he received the injury to his ankle, and, owing to the condition of his system, he never rallied from the shock of the injury, and died in one week; that had it not been for the condition of his system above described the injury to the ankle would have been a comparatively trivial matter." This theory is corroborated by the physicians who attended him.

Dr. R. J. Mohr, examining surgeon, and late surgeon of the Tenth Iowa Volunteers, testifies that the injured ankle became mortified on the third day after the accident; four days later he died of exhaustion; that it is his opinion that a healthy person would not have died of this injury; and it is also his conviction that while the injury to his ankle was in a small degree contributory, the principal factor in the cause of his death was the direct result of the wound.

Dr. Calvin Snook testifies that he had known the soldier about twenty-five years; that soldier's poor health was attributed to the wound in his arm, which was painful and would at times become inflamed and discharge pus; that he had a conversation with the soldier the day before he received the injury to his foot, and from his appearance, and from what he told affiant, he was suffering from septicemia, caused by said wound; and that he examined him after the injury of foot, and in his opinion the wound in foot was not sufficient to have caused the death of a healthy person.

The physician's certificate of death, signed by Richard J. Mohr, M. D., the attending physician, shows that the cause of death was "septicemia from wound of elbow of long standing, complicated by crushing injury of right ankle; death from shock."

The Pension Office rejected the widow's claim on the opinion of the medical referee that the soldier's death was caused by the injury to his right ankle and was not a result of his wound.

In the appeal of the claimant to the Secretary of the Interior the claimant states that by the evidence on file it is shown that for months prior to the soldier's death, and before the injury to his ankle, he had been suffering from septicemia, the result of the absorption of the poisonous products of the wounded arm.

It is apparent to the committee that the man was in a very low condition when the accident to his ankle occurred. His blood was poisoned, and the injury to his ankle only hastened his death, which would inevitably have ensued in a short time had he been spared the last infliction.

The rejection of the widow's claim is based upon the opinion of the medical referee. It is the basis of the affirmation of the Commissioner's decision by the Secretary. In our opinion the weight of testimony does not justify this. The soldier's physicians have delivered with confidence a very different opinion. They saw the soldier, treated him, one of them twenty-five years. The medical referee's opinion is inferential. It is not a strained conclusion to say that the testimony amply justifies the belief that the soldier's death was mainly referable to his wound.

The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

MARY L. WILLIAMS.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. CASWELL) was the bill (S. 1716) granting a pension to Mary L. Williams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary L. Williams, widow of Reuben Williams, late a private in Company C, One hundred and forty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1716) granting a pension to Mary L. Williams, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The facts in the case are set forth in the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which is as follows:

"The claimant is the widow of Reuben Williams, late a private in Company C, One hundred and forty-seventh New York Volunteers. He enlisted August 22, 1862, and was discharged January 8, 1864. He was pensioned at the rate of $2 a month for chronic diarrhea from the date of his discharge. On the 3d of March, 1865, he was dropped from the rolls, on the certificate of an examining surgeon, who reported that the disability had ceased to exist.

"He died February 12, 1879. The widow filed an application for pension in June, 1880, and it was rejected nearly three years after, on the ground that he died of pneumonia and not of chronic diarrhea. The testimony in the case shows that chronic diarrhea existed to a greater or less extent until he died; and in the opinion of the committee his allowance of pension was inadequate and should never have been discontinued.

"The widow appealed from the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions and experienced the disappointment usual in such cases.

"As to the connection of the disease of the soldier with his death, his attending physician, Dr. Staples, says:

"'He was the family physician of the soldier for nine years, during which time he had occasionally been called upon to treat him for diarrhea or disease of the bowels; that said Williams died on the 12th of February, 1879, from pneumonia, complicated with enteric or bowel disease, which contributed largely toward the fatal result.'

"In another affidavit the affiant says:

"'The soldier came to his death from an attack of acute pneumonia, which confined him to his bed about three weeks, and he emphatically connects chronic diarrhea with the fatal result.'"

"The Pension Office decision is that death was not the result of chronic diarrhea, because he died of pneumonia.

"This man had suffered from chronic diarrhea from the time of his discharge, January, 1864, and previous, to the day of his death, February 12, 1879, covering a period of more than fifteen years. He had been allowed the pitiful pension of $2 a month, which did not pay for his medicine, and that was taken from him in a little over a year after it was granted.

"The soldier was a painter. Two witnesses who knew him well, and one of them a companion mechanic from 1871 to 1879, says he was never free from chronic diarrhea, and that he was greatly debilitated thereby. From their description he was unfit to labor, but he was compelled to do it because he was denied a pension, except the meager sum of $2 per month, which was paid him a short time and was then taken from him.

"It is in evidence that he had pneumonia three weeks. He also had chronic diarrhea. The latter had dragged him down fifteen years. It was a struggle between the two diseases which should prove the fatal one. His attending physician says he died from pneumonia complicated with enteric or bowel disease, and the Pension Office says, 'No, it was pneumonia.'

"The committee believe this man should have a pension without interval, and a rating adequate to his disability; that chronic diarrhea and pneumonia are jointly responsible for his death, one as much as the other; and that the widow is entitled to a pension.

"The bill is reported favorably, with a recommendation that it do pass."

Your committee concur in the conclusions reached in the foregoing report, and therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. LOUISE SILVERS.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. HUDD) was the bill (S. 896) for the relief of Mrs. Louise Silvers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Louise Silvers, widow of Frank Silvers, late of Company F, Fourteenth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 896) for the relief of Mrs. Louise Silvers, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The Senate Committee on Pensions report as follows:

"The husband of the claimant was a private in Company H, Fourteenth Wisconsin Infantry. He died in March, 1880. Some years before his death he applied for an invalid pension, which was not allowed. After his death his widow applied, and her claim was rejected on the ground that the diseases of which he died were not due to his military service. The number of special examinations and the time and money spent show that the claim has been resisted with more than ordinary determination. It is a simple case, in which there are no visible intricacies except such as are referable to the inconsistencies practiced by the Army in enlisting men and the contradictory testimoney for and against the claim.

"In his declaration for invalid pension the man makes oath that while in the service he was seriously injured by being run over by a heavy commissary wagon, the wheels passing over his chest and producing disease of heart and lungs. It appears from the evidence that he was affected by these disabilities from the time of his discharge. It appears that he died from these diseases, for which he was treated continuously from the time of his discharge until he died. A number of witnesses testify to their personal knowledge of the occurrence of the accident. They were his comrades in service, and saw the mark of the wheel.

"Dr. William H. Burtman, of Fort Howard, the home of the soldier, testifies that he has practiced medicine and surgery twenty-five years; that he was called to see Frank Silvers the 3d day of March, 1880, the day before he died; that he found him suffering from disease of heart and lungs; that he had been injured in the chest by having a wagon run over him, which, in affiant's opinion, was of such a nature and locality as to produce disease of the heart and lungs. Affiant further deposes and says that he found a scar on the front side of the chest over the heart and lungs, which was the result of some severe injury, and from affiant's best knowledge and belief was received in the service and in the line of duty.

"There is much proof in corroboration of this, but the Pension Office, which has had made eleven special examinations, procured the affidavit of the captain of the company, who swears that Silvers was not fit for a soldier when he enlisted; he thinks he was enlisted for a cook; he was upward of fifty years old; he had some kind of ailment at the time; was an habitual drinker; does not remember any accident to him; he does not know how he was disabled or what was his disability; whatever it was, he thinks he received it while he was in the Navy.

"This affidavit is too carelessly prepared to be of any value as evidence. He thinks the man, being old, infirm, and a drunkard, must have been enlisted for a cook. The military department does not enlist cooks, and, if it did, it would not select one of the quality described by this captain.

"The Pension Office assumes that the soldier was in the Navy, and it attempts, unsuccessfully, to prove it; and it premises that his injury from being run over is referable to his Navy service. There is proof, ample in quantity and quality, to show that the man was sound when he entered the service, that his habits were good, and his enlistment papers show that he was only thirty-two years old.

"If he was old, dilapidated, intemperate, disqualified by his disabilities, it is very strange that he was accepted, and that the marks upon his breast, which were the proofs of his disqualifying injuries, were not discovered by the recruiting officers whose duty it was to enlist only men of suitable age and sound in body."

Your committee have very carefully examined the voluminous evidence in the case, and, as usual in this class of cases, find much conflicting testimony. It may be proper to state, however, that, while soldier may have been slightly, if any, over military-service age at time of his enlistment in October, 1861, the fact remains that he was captured at the battle of Shiloh, Tenn., served after release without any evidence of disability, until February, 1863, when he came under treatment for chronic diarrhea. Later on he was transferred to the Veteran Reserve Corps, and in November, 1864, he is shown by the records to have suffered from chronic rheumatism. He was discharged upon surgeon's certificate of disability, which sets forth that the soldier is incapable of performing military duty, because of chronic rheumatism and an injury received in the United States Navy when nineteen years of age, also old age, he being fifty-three years of age. Soldier is shown to have been a complete wreck at discharge and ever thereafter until he died, of heart disease, on March 3, 1880.

Soldier applied for pension on account of injury to chest by being thrown from and run over by a commissary wagon in May, 1863. In this he is corroborated by eye-witnesses. He is also shown to have suffered from frequent hemorrhages from the lungs after discharge.

It is not probable that the injury alleged to have been received in the Navy at the age of nineteen years had any connection with his death-cause. Your committee are inclined to the opinion that the rheumatism in service was the principal factor in the death-cause, while the injury to the chest was the cause of disease of lungs, from which soldier suffered continuously until death.

The widow is left without any means whatever, and being over sixty years of age and feeble, must depend upon others for support.

Your committee return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. FREDERICKA HAUSER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. GUENTHER) was the bill (S. 1110) granting a pension to Mrs. Fredericka Hauser.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Fredericka Hauser, widow of John F. Hauser, late of Company H, Sixth Wisconsin Infantry.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1110) granting a pension to Mrs. Fredericka Hauser, submit the following report:

The committee has carefully examined the papers on file in this case, and after such examination they adopt the Senate report as their own and recommend that the bill do pass.

[Senate report No. 648, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1110) granting a pension to Mrs. Fredericka Hauser, have examined the same, and report:

The husband of the claimant was Maj. John F. Hauser, who was mustered into the service of the United States as captain of Company H, Sixth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers, July 16, 1861, and was mustered in as major of the regiment to date March 24, 1863, and was honorably discharged March 18, 1864, on tender of resignation on account of death in his family. The record shows that he was accorded leave on account of sickness, but there is no cloud upon his service from the beginning to the end.

The Surgeon-General's report shows that he entered Seminary General Hospital, Georgetown, D. C., September 17, 1862, with debility, but soon returned to duty. He applied for a pension, claiming that in 1863, on a march through Pennsylvania, he became afflicted with neuralgia of the head and epileptic fits, caused by exposure and physical and mental excitement while in the service.

There are two witnesses who testify in the case, both members of his company, and both citizens of Alma, Buffalo County, where Major Hauser resided. They are "reputable and entitled to credit." They say they were well acquainted with Major Hauser; that when he was commissioned captain of their company, in 1861, he was robust and enjoyed the best of health; that he continued in command of said company from its organization till August 1, 1862, when he was taken sick while the regiment was making a raid on Frederick Hall's Station, in Virginia, and was sent to general hospital, Alexandria; that he rejoined his regiment in November, 1862, and continued in command of his company until promoted major in the spring of 1863, which position he held when the battle of Gettysburgh was fought; that he returned to Fountain City, Buffalo County, in 1869.

Dr. S. J. F. Miller, surgeon of the Milwaukee Soldiers' Home, says, under date of March 13, 1863:

"The records of this hospital show that Maj. John F. Hauser, late of the Sixth Wisconsin Volunteers, was admitted to this branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers on the 21st of May, 1880, and to the hospital on the same date, complaining of intense neuralgia about the head, and stating that he suffered from occasional epileptic fits. He was returned to quarters June 1, 1880, to enable him to accept a detail as a corporal of a company. He was readmitted to the hospital July 22, 1880, since when to the present time he has been constantly a patient in the hospital, suffering from occasional fits of epilepsy and from frequent attacks of more or less severe pain in the head. There is no probability that he will ever recover his health sufficiently to take care of himself and earn a living."

The same surgeon, under date of May 12, 1885, gives the hospital records as follows:

"His disability at the date of admission (May, 1880) was due to epilepsy from neuralgia, never free from pain longer than two or three days at a time. Removed the second branch of the fifth pair of nerves in hopes of giving relief, but without result of benefit from the operation. He was admitted to the hospital on the 21st day of May, 1880, suffering with epilepsy the most of the time up to June 8, 1883, when he died from exhaustion. His habits could not be better."

The examining surgeon at Milwaukee, speaking for the board, relates the statement of Major Hauser, namely, that he was struck with an epileptic fit in August, 1862, near Frederick Hall Station, Virginia; that he was taken to Alexandria Hospital, where he was treated until he returned to his regiment, and says:

"The board has reason to believe that the foregoing statement is untrue; that the neuralgia and epileptic fits to which he is subject are of post bellum origin. At the same time the rating for his disability is total."

This is a bare statement, without explanation or corroboration; whereas his two comrades swear to their knowledge of his admission to hospital for the disability incurred at Frederick Hall Station, and to the fact that he was a healthy man before he entered the service.

The Pension Office sent out letters in search of confidential information, with a view to prejudicing the claim by discovering some moral delinquency on the part of the claimant. One of these confidential correspondents refers the office to Joseph Leicht, a German editor at Winona, Minn., who says:

"I know J. F. Hauser since fall of 1879. He was a strong and well-built man, and had, according to the statement of men who knew him before he enlisted, an iron constitution. He complained when I worked with him in 1870-'71 of neuralgia. I saw Hauser last in Soldiers' Home, near Milwaukee, a total wreck, in all probability in consequence of his service."

Not a word in this letter prejudicial to him in any way, but confirming his broken-down condition and referring it to that service.

Otto Schorse, a druggist in Milwaukee, certifies that—

"He served in the same regiment with Hauser; to his prior good health; that after the war he found him in the Soldiers' Home a cripple. His wife is now at the home, for several years, earning hardly enough to support her. I therefore recommend the old lady to the support the Government is able to grant."

The committee have investigated this case solely with reference to the widow's rights, and they are convinced that her husband was a healthy man when he entered the service, and that his disability and death are due to the service. He was an educated German gentleman, and there is evidence that he was much respected. His widow is a lady of refinement and intelligence, worthy of respect and consideration. In her old age she is compelled to do manual labor to procure a bare subsistence. The committee are of the opinion that she should have a pension according to the rank her husband held at the time of his discharge.

The bill is reported favorably with a recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ABRAHAM J. BUCKLES.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up for consideration by Mr. THOMPSON, of California) was the bill (H. R. 9263) granting an increase of pension to Abraham J. Buckles.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Abraham J. Buckles, late second lieutenant Company E, Twentieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, to $45 per month.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9263) granting an increase of pension to Abraham J. Buckles, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to submit the following report:

The beneficiary named in the bill enlisted in Company E, Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers, June 29, 1861, transferred to Company E, Twentieth Indiana Volunteers, and mustered into said company as first lieutenant February 27, 1865; mustered out May 15, 1865. He filed an application for pension June 24, 1865, based upon amputation of right leg above the knee, caused by a gunshot wound received near Petersburgh, Va., March 25, 1865, and was pensioned for same disability June, 1866, at $15 per month from May 15, 1865.

In application filed September 16, 1870, he also claims for gunshot wound of right shoulder received at battle of Gettysburgh, July, 1863, and for gunshot wound of right side, fracturing two ribs, received in the battle of the Wilderness, May 5, 1864. All of these wounds are established by record and testimony.

In August, 1871, his pension was increased to $20 per month for gunshot wound in the right side and shoulder and loss of right leg, commencing March 14, 1871, based upon a medical examination made March 14, 1871, which describes the wounds as follows:

"First. Wound of right shoulder; ball struck the clavicle about 1½ inches from outer end and fracturing the bone, deforming and weaking the shoulder. Second. Wound of right side; ball struck last true rib just at its union with the cartilage, and passing through the first false rib fractured it about 4 inches from the spine, causing internal soreness in the region of the wound and having a tendency to inflame and form abscesses. Third. Amputation of right leg about the middle."

He was rated three-fourths for wounds of shoulder and side.

The committee have received from the honorable Commissioner of Pensions a letter through the honorable Secretary of the Interior, as follows:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
"Washington, D. C., March 30, 1888.

"SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith the papers in the claim above cited, for transmittal through your office to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, House of Representatives, that the attention of Congress may be invited to the facts in the case, for such action in the premises, under provisions of joint resolution approved May 29, 1830, as that honorable body may deem just and proper.

"The pensioner lost his right leg above the knee at the battle of Petersburgh, Va., March 28, 1865, and received wounds in the right shoulder and right side, fracturing two ribs, at the battles of Gettysburgh and the Wilderness, and is now drawing a pension of $36 per month by reason of said wounds, which amount, however, is only that allowed by law for one of his wounds, namely, amputation of leg above the knee, the combined disabilities not being such as to require the constant aid of another person.

"It is believed that this is a case wherein relief should be sought at the hands of Congress, this Bureau being unable to allow an increased rating under existing laws, and the passage of a special act increasing the rate of pension in this case from $36 to $50 per month from the date of the passage of such act is recommended.

"Very respectfully,

"JOHN C. BLACK, Commissioner.

"The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR."

Your committee are of opinion that the recommendation contained in the above-quoted letter should receive favorable consideration at the hands of Congress, and therefore return the accompanying bill, which fixes the proposed increase at $45, in accordance with the usual practice in this class of cases, and ask that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JANE SMALLRIDGE.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked by Mr. GEAR) was the bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, instructed to place on the pension-roll the name of Jane Smallridge, of Fairfield, Iowa, widow of John Smallridge, late a private of Company F, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry, and pay her a pension subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SPOONER) was read, as follows:

That Jane Smallridge, widow of John Smallridge, who was a private in Company F, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, was an army nurse, and performed efficient service in that capacity during the late war, as is established by the affidavits, filed with her petition, of Capt. B. F. Crail, Lieut. Richard Gaines, Acting Assistant Surgeon J. W. Hayden, William H. Sullivan, and other members of said regiment.

It also appears from the affidavits of said Dr. Hayden and Lieutenant Gaines that Mrs. Smallridge's health and constitution were impaired in the exposure of such service, and that she has since been and now is feeble and broken in constitution and health.

She is now over seventy-eight years of age, feeble in mind and body, without means of support, and dependent upon the charity of those not legally bound for her support for her means of subsistence. Her husband, said John Smallridge, died in 1887, depriving her of her last reliance for maintenance.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with amendments, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "pension," in line 7, and insert at the end of the bill the words, "of $12 per month, from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment recommended by the committee was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EMANUEL H. CUSTER.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (the consideration of which was asked for by Mr. CHIPMAN) was the bill (H. R. 9387) for the relief of Emanuel H. Custer.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Emanuel H. Custer, dependent father of Thomas W. Custer, who was a captain in Company C, Seventh United States Cavalry, subject to the provisions and limitations of pension laws, and pay to him a pension of $50 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

Mr. CHEADLE. I am perfectly willing that that shall go over to a full House.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that.

Mr. CHEADLE. I certainly shall.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Why, the gentleman has not even heard the report read.

Mr. CHEADLE. I have read the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. CHIPMAN) was read, as follows:

Emanuel H. Custer is the father of General George Custer, and of Thomas Custer, late of the Seventh United States Cavalry, both of whom, as well as three sons-in-law of Mr. Custer, were killed in the battle of Big Horn.

He is a man of more than eighty years of age and in very reduced circumstances. The committee do not feel that it is necessary to recount the great services of the Custer family during the war of the rebellion in the armies of the Union. Braver and better soldiers never served.

Mr. Custer is now stripped of all support. Those who would have cared for his old age have given their lives for their country.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MATSON. I would like to hear the provisions of the bill read again.

The CHAIRMAN. It provides $50 a month as the proposed increase.

Mr. MATSON. The widow of General Custer is now drawing a pension on account of his death.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask that this bill may go over until the morning with the usual order, otherwise I shall be compelled to call a quorum upon it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the bill be again reported.

The bill was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his objection.

Mr. LAIDLAW. This old man is very aged and I understand is in very feeble health.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I know very well that the gentleman from Indiana would not like to see that old man working at his advanced age to make a living for himself and family. Does the gentleman still insist upon his objection?

Mr. CHEADLE. Certainly I do.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Very well; I do not suppose there is another man in this whole world who would make that objection to this bill.

Mr. CHEADLE. That may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the right to object.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, as evidently we can not do anything with it to-night.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Wait a little and let us see.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. CHEADLE. Allow me to make a suggestion. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that the previous question be ordered, and that the vote be taken on it in the morning in a full House.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be impracticable, owing to another order of the House.

Mr. CHIPMAN. If it can be done I am perfectly willing.

Mr. MATSON. There is a special order, and a very important one, for to-morrow, the consideration of the tariff bill, and I shall object to anything that is likely to interfere with that.

Mr. McMILLIN. I had just risen to make the same objection made by the gentleman from Indiana. We do not know how many roll-calls may be required before that bill is disposed of.

Mr. CHEADLE. Then I ask unanimous consent that it go over until next Wednesday.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the gentleman from Indiana is correct in his opposition to the bill. The widow of this soldier has been already getting a large pension, on account of the death of the soldier, by a special act of Congress.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Will the gentleman allow a correction?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. CHIPMAN. There were two sons and a grandson; all were killed. The soldier for whom this old man is pensioned is Thomas Custer, a brother of General Custer, and he left no widow.

Mr. McMILLIN. But he is getting a pension of $50 a month.

Mr. CHIPMAN. No; he is getting only a pension of $20 a month now; a captain's pension. So that it is not General Custer at all, but a brother of his, who left no widow.

I am willing that it should go over until Wednesday, if that be the desire of the House.

Mr. McMILLIN. I noticed that General Custer's name was mentioned, and I presumed that it was intended for a member of his family.

Mr. CHEADLE. I would suggest Thursday morning.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Very well; I do not object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest Friday, that being the day usually fixed for private bills.

Mr. CHEADLE. All right.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not object to that. I request, therefore, that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that the previous question be ordered upon its passage, with fifteen minutes for debate allowed on each side, and that its further consideration be postponed until Friday morning next immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I object. I think that there are now not less than fifteen to eighteen—the gentleman from Indiana on my left, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, informs me that there are twenty just such cases on the Calendar.

Mr. CHIPMAN. There is not another such case. Probably there is not one in the history of the country.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not mean precisely such a case as this, where a father is to be pensioned who was dependent upon his dead son, but I mean pension cases which have gone over from night sessions under the agreement that they should be considered in a full House, the previous question ordered, and fifteen minutes' debate allowed.

I think when we have given this night to this class of cases that they ought to be disposed of here. We ought not to put these cases over into the business of the day. They are accumulating on the Calendars until we now have fifteen or twenty cases which obstruct the consideration of other business.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I suggest to the gentleman that there are no cases like this.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Why not consider the case this evening and dispose of it?

Mr. CHEADLE. Because the gentleman from Indiana objects and calls a quorum on it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Why not allow this case to take the same course as all the other cases on which a quorum has been called?

Mr. CHIPMAN. That is what we are proposing to do—to set this bill for Friday morning. We propose it shall be acted on after ten minutes' debate.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I do not object with reference to the time to be occupied in debate. My objection is to taking the business to which Friday night is allotted and turning it over to the day sessions of the House, which are devoted to other business.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. The trouble is that this particular bill is objected to by one member only. We are blocked at this point. He is willing that it be voted on at a day session of the House without debate. This is different from other bills in that respect.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. There are, I understand, about fifteen or eighteen such cases.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I may be mistaken; but there are the cases of Mrs. General Price, Mrs. General Paul, and others.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Allow me a word of explanation. The applicant for a pension in this case is no general. He is a man eighty years old—not a general, but a father of a general. I know him, and I know that he is in destitute circumstances, though he is the father of George A. Custer.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Michigan does not understand the point I make. I am perfectly willing that this bill shall be taken up and considered. I wish the gentleman from Michigan to understand that I am not objecting to the passage of the bill. What I object to is the arrangement made every Friday night by which twenty cases or more which were on the Calendar as business of Friday night have been transferred from the night sessions to the day sessions.

Mr. CHIPMAN. The gentleman will pardon me if I suggest that there is no day set, as I understand, for those other cases. This case, if consent be now given, will be the only case fixed for next Friday. There is no other day set for the other cases.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Is such a discrimination just to those cases which precede this?

Mr. CHIPMAN. Well, I can not see any injustice in it. I would like to do something for this old man before he dies.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I am perfectly willing that his case be considered and passed; but the point I want to emphasize is that business set apart for Friday night ought to be transacted on Friday night.

Mr. CHIPMAN. But a single member is objecting.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. We would like to pass the bill to-night, but we can not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. If it is in the power of one member to put off cases to a particular day, I think it is a bad precedent. If this bill can not be acted upon, let it be passed over on the Calendar exactly as any other case would be.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. That is equivalent to defeating it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Why should not this man be put on the same footing as other soldiers on whose cases a quorum has been called?

Mr. CHIPMAN. This is not the case of a soldier, but the father of a soldier—a very old man.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I have no objection to the bill; I do not wish to be understood as opposing it.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Your objection may end in defeating it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. If you will give us ten minutes——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. There is no trouble about the time.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. I will not stand in the way of the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that its further consideration be postponed until next Friday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the previous question to be ordered on the bill, and fifteen minutes allowed on each side for debate. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

JOHN S. BRYANT.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. DINGLEY) was the bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the pension laws, the name of John S. Bryant, late a private in Company G, Twenty-ninth Maine Regiment Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

According to the record in the Adjutant-General's Office it appears that soldier enlisted December 7, 1863, and was discharged for disability January 14, 1865. The records in the adjutant-general's office at Augusta, Me., show the date of discharge to have been September 10, 1864, but the discrepancy on this point is immaterial.

The facts in the case are that some time after enlistment, and while soldier's company was still at Augusta, Me., he was granted a furlough, and went to his home at Chatham, N. H. As the furlough was about to expire he started in a carriage with three comrades for the headquarters of his regiment. On the way the carriage was overturned and soldier seriously injured. He was conveyed to a hospital, and not reporting at the expiration of his furlough was marked as a deserter, but when the facts became known this charge was promptly canceled, and as soon as able he was allowed to resume his military duties without trial.

The fact of the incurrence of the injury as alleged is sworn to by his three comrades, but claim for pension was rejected on the ground that soldier was not strictly in line of duty when the accident occurred.

This is a purely technical objection, and as the case seems meritorious in every other particular, your committee report the bill back favorably and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LOUISA PROVOST.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. GALLINGER) was the bill (S. 1884) granting a pension to Louisa Provost.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Louisa Provost, widow of Peter Provost, late a soldier in Company B, Seventeenth Vermont.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

This is a Senate bill, the report in the case being as follows:

"The soldier rendered brave and efficient service for some two years, during which time, at the battle of Spottsylvania, he was severely wounded in the left ankle by a shell and taken prisoner. He remained a prisoner for about three months and was then exchanged. This wound never healed, and for it he was pensioned until his death, which occurred in 1882.

"The only question in the case is whether the wound was the cause of death. It appears from the statement of his attending physician, Dr. Fisk, of Roxbury, Vt., a regular practitioner in good standing, that thirty-six hours before his death he found the soldier in a cramped and doubled-up condition, suffering great pain from the wounded foot, which was greatly swollen and inflamed. It appears that the wound was ragged and dark-colored, with symptoms of mortification. All these symptoms continued to grow worse until his death. The inflammation in the bowels became specially aggravated, and the cause of death is spoken of as inflammation of the bowels. We can see no reason to question the opinion of his attending physician that the wound was the direct cause of the inflammation and death."

Not being fully satisfied with the Senate report, your committee carefully examined the papers on file in the Pension Office in this case.

The certificate of the attending physician, evidently written by an ignorant man, is something of a curiosity, and it is difficult from that paper to intelligently determine the real facts in the case. It does appear, however, that the wound was a very ugly one; that on the day of the soldier's death it was terribly inflamed and painful, and the presumption is that it was the cause of death.

As the bill is for a widow in needy circumstances, your committee give her the benefit of whatever doubt there may be in the case, and report the bill back favorably and recommend its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LACHLAN H. M'INTOSH.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. CARLTON) was the bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the name of Lachlan H. McIntosh, late captain's clerk United States steamer Scourge, war with Mexico the restoration to take effect from and after the passage hereof.

The report (by Mr. CARLTON) was read, as follows:

The claimant was made a pensioner of the United States under the act of January 29, 1887, by a certificate issued by the Pension Bureau July 12, 1887. He was pensioned as a captain's clerk, United States steamer Scourge. On February 6, 1888, his name was dropped from the rolls upon a decision of the Commissioner of Pensions in a similar case, that a captain's clerk was neither an enlisted man nor a commissioned officer, and hence did not come within the provisions of the act of January, 1887, granting pensions to Mexican veterans. The claimant therefore applies to Congress for relief.

The records of the Departments show that the claimant reported for duty as clerk to Lieut. C. G. Hunter, commanding the United States steamer Scourge, on February 16, 1847, and is borne on the list of officers of that vessel on her sailing from New York March 4, 1847, for the home squadron; that he continued to serve in that capacity on board that vessel until the following April, when he returned to the United States with the commanding officer, Lieutenant Hunter; and that meanwhile the Scourge had proceeded to the Gulf of Mexico and assisted in the capture of Vera Cruz, Alvarado, and Fla-co-tal-pam.

These facts also appear from the testimony of Admirals William G. Temple and Melancthon Smith, of the United States Navy, and from other evidence obtained by your committee.

It appears from the record of events of the Mexican war that—

"April 2, 1847, Alvarado and Fla-co-tal-pam surrendered to Lieutenant Hunter, United States steamer Scourge."

In the capture of Alvarado the steamer was compelled to open fire on the town, and in the surrender of Fla-co-tal-pam the claimant took an active and important part, being made bearer of the order demanding surrender of said place.

Mr. McIntosh was allowed his extra pay as an officer engaged in the Mexican war, and the Pension Bureau allowed him a land warrant under the act of 1855.

Your committee recommend, in view of the naval service of the claimant, and of his meritorious conduct therein, that his name be restored to the pension-roll, and that the following bill be adopted as a substitute for the one now before them, namely:

A bill for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the name of Lachlan H. McIntosh, late captain's clerk United States steamer Scourge, war with Mexico, the restoration to take effect from and after the passage hereof.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend this bill by striking out, in line 3, the word "Treasury," in the phrase "Secretary of the Treasury," and inserting "Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROSALIE O'SULLIVAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar (consideration of which was asked for by Mr. CARUTH) was the bill (H. R. 9358) to increase the pension of Rosalie O'Sullivan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to pay to Rosalie O'Sullivan, widow of Eugene O'Sullivan, who was a soldier in Company A, Fourth Kentucky Infantry, during the Mexican war, in addition to the pension now received by her, the sum of $2 for each of her two minor children, Mary Eugenia O'Sullivan, who was born June 14, 1879, and Joseph E. O'Sullivan, born January 30, 1879, and he is authorized and directed to pay the same until each child shall arrive at the age of sixteen years, when said additional payments shall cease and determine.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. BLISS) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9358) to increase the pension of Rosalie O'Sullivan, have considered the same and report as follows:

Rosalie O'Sullivan is now in receipt of a pension at the rate of $8 per month under the Mexican service-pension act of January 29, 1887, she being the widow of Eugene O'Sullivan, late a private in Company A, Fourth Kentucky Volunteers, who served from October 4, 1847, to July 25, 1848. The present bill proposes to increase her pension to the extent of $2 for each of her two minor children until they shall arrive at the age of sixteen years.

It appears that the widow, Mrs. O'Sullivan, is in ill health, and is often compelled to call upon her neighbors and upon the Association of Mexican Veterans for assistance in obtaining the necessaries of life for herself and the two minor children of the soldier.

The act of January 29, 1887, apparently did not contemplate the existence of minor children of a Mexican veteran, and made no provision therefor.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill, amended, however, by striking out all in the bill after the word "children," in line 8, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "by the soldier, until each child shall arrive at the age of sixteen years, when said additional payments shall cease and determine."

Mr. CARUTH. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, after the words, "two dollars," insert "per month."

The amendment was agreed to, as was also the amendment of the committee.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HELPLESS SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (S. 1000) to increase the pensions of certain soldiers and sailors who are utterly helpless from injuries received or diseases contracted while in the service of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is improperly on the Private Calendar, and if there be no objection, it will be referred to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOSEPH W. M'CONNELL.

The next business on the Calendar (consideration of which was asked by Mr. CHEADLE) was the bill (H. R. 3544) granting a pension to Joseph W. McConnell.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph W. McConnell, late a sergeant of Company E, Fifteenth Regiment, Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R.

3544) granting a pension to Joseph W. McConnell, have considered the same and submit the following report:

The petition of the claimant states that he enlisted in Company E, Fifteenth Regiment Indiana Infantry, June 14, 1861, and was discharged for disability August 2, 1862. He alleges that while in camp at Elkwater Valley, West Virginia, while carrying a log of wood for the purpose of building a fire in said camp, and when in the act of unloading said log from his shoulder, he felt a sharp, keen pain in his left side, in front of the hip, 2½ inches to the left of the center line of his abdomen, and about 1¼ inches above the penis.

The surgeon (whose name he does not know) examined him and pronounced it rupture, and he states that said disability has troubled him more or less ever since. He says he has not applied to the Pension Department for a pension by reason of said injury because after making inquiry for evidence of all said facts he has failed to find any surgeons, officers, and comrades who know said facts; and the reason he can not find them is that soon after said rupture he was sent to hospitals other than his regimental hospital; was in the care and under the treatment of strange surgeons, and in the company of and associated with sick and wounded soldiers who were strangers to him, and all of whose names he has forgotten or never knew.

A petition and two or three letters from neighbors and acquaintances state that the claimant is in feeble health, and unable to earn a living by manual labor; and that he is a man of exemplary habits and good moral character, and that his statements may be relied upon as truthful. This is all the evidence, if the same may be called evidence, submitted to the committee.

No medical evidence, either prior to enlistment, during his term of service, or during all the years that have elapsed since that time, is furnished, nor is there any evidence such as is necessary to base a favorable report upon, and your committee must therefore submit an adverse report and recommend that the bill do lie upon the table.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask consideration of that bill notwithstanding the adverse report of the committee. The claimant in this case was seventy-two years of age last month. In 1861 he volunteered in the Fifteenth Indiana Regiment. Soon thereafter, while in the line of duty, and carrying wood to make a fire, in crossing a small branch he slipped on a log and fell, and was ruptured.

There was nobody with him when the disability was incurred. He was sent to the hospital. We all know that in the early stages of the war hospital records were very incomplete. He was sent among strangers—strange comrades and strange surgeons—and he does not know the names of the comrades with him, nor the surgeon who treated him. He was discharged; and the discharge paper simply gives the words, "for disability." I have known the claimant since 1862, and I say that there is no more honorable man living than Joseph W. McConnell, but under the law granting pensions the statement of the claimant can not be taken at all. Therefore it was physically impossible for him to submit to the Department such evidence as would entitle him to a pension. He has been a sufferer since he was ruptured in 1861 until this hour.

He is an old man of seventy-two years; all his people are dead; and the question presents itself as to whether the Government will give him the relief to which he is entitled, or whether he shall go over the hill to the poor-house. In cases like this one, where there is no doubt of the disability, where no one was present when the disability was incurred, when no evidence can be obtained under the law, it is the highest privilege of Congress to exercise the right of granting the claimant a pension. He asks that it be granted according to the rating of the law.

I wish to make one further statement. My colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] knows this gentleman, and, if it were necessary, we could bring the certificate of five hundred persons in Vermillion County who know the character of this man. I know there is no medical evidence on file of the rupture, and it could not be obtained.

Mr. MORRILL. Is there any evidence of any kind on file?

Mr. CHEADLE. None except his own statement.

Mr. MORRILL. Is there a particle of any other evidence?

Mr. CHEADLE. There can not be any evidence except his own statement.

Mr. MORRILL. Why can he not show his condition before he went into the service and after he came out of it?

Mr. STRUBLE. Has he made a personal statement?

Mr. MORRILL. Was he an able-bodied man before he went into the service?

Mr. CHEADLE. I do not know; I did not live in that county at the time and can not state that fact.

Mr. MATSON. I think I may safely say that there are no adverse reports from the Committee on Invalid Pensions if a favorable report can reasonably be made.

Now, in this case I have no doubt that, as my colleague says, the claimant is a very worthy citizen and was a very good soldier. I do not question that, though I do not know how long he served. I think my colleague did not state that fact. The main reason why an adverse report is made in this case is because he has never filed an application for pension in the Pension Office, because he has failed to follow the ordinary channel of the law. If Congress undertakes to grant pensions in all these cases upon original applications, they will increase the business of Congress very largely. There is no pretense on the part of my friend that this man can not show what his condition was when he came out of the service.

He certainly could show if he was a sound man when he went into the service and could show whether he was a disabled man when he came out of the service. On that kind of proof thousands of pensions have been granted by the Pension Office; and there is no reason why an exception should be made in the case of this man. Why should my constituent or your constituent be required to go to the Pension Office and have his claim passed upon before he can come to Congress and an exception made in this case, when the claimant has not exhausted his remedy at all? That is the ground upon which the adverse report is based.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Is it not the fact in this case that the law is such that it will be no earthly use for him to go there?

Mr. MATSON. I think not. I think if he would go to the Pension Office and show, as he could show according to the statement made by my colleague [Mr. CHEADLE], that he was sound when he went into the service and was ruptured when he came out he could probably get his pension. At any rate, ought he not to be required to try? All the rest of the soldiers are required to do it. Congress does not take original jurisdiction except in some case where the man was not mustered in, or where there is some other good reason, where it is clear and certain that he could not get a pension at the Pension Office; but this is not such a case. This is a case where the man probably could get a pension, and, no matter how good a man he is, or how good a soldier he was, his case ought not to be taken up by Congress in this irregular way and he be preferred above all the other million of soldiers who survived the war. That is the ground of the adverse report. There is nothing in the report that reflects upon the claimant, nothing that makes his case any worse at the Pension Office. He can have the benefit there of his own statement and of whatever proof he can produce that he was sound when he went into the service and unsound when he came out. Besides that, there is no testimony here from a single physician that he is an unsound man now. There is no sort of evidence of it, except his own bare statement that he was ruptured while he was in the service.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] forget that his own colleague [Mr. CHEADLE] says that he knows that the man is ruptured?

Mr. MATSON. Does he say he has ever examined him?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. No; but any one knows enough to say that if he knows that the man wears a truss.

Mr. MATSON. However that may be, ought this man to be treated differently from all the other soldiers? Ought not he be required to show by a medical examination, as all other applicants are required to show, that he is ruptured? Why should he be treated differently from other soldiers?

Mr. CHEADLE. Will my colleague let me have one minute to make a statement which I ought to have made before?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. CHEADLE. I forgot to state that this old gentleman and his attorneys have corresponded with all his surviving comrades and have satisfied themselves that there is not a living soul who was with him at the time he was injured or who knows that the disability was incurred in the service. Now, his own statement would not be taken at the Pension Office, and therefore how could he go there with any prospect of success? His own statement would not be accepted as evidence, and he says himself that after diligent inquiry he finds it is impossible to obtain the evidence of any of his comrades who know the facts.

Mr. MATSON. But by the statement of my colleague the very record itself shows that this man was discharged for disability. The law makes a prima facie presumption that he was sound when he went into the service, and here is a discharge which this man says he has showing that he was discharged for disability; yet he says that he does not want to go to the Pension Office even with a prima facie record, but comes here and asks Congress to select him out from all the other soldiers and give him a pension without doing what we require all the other soldiers to do.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I do not want to interfere in this matter, but on general principles here is a case where a man for whose honor and uprightness his Representative in Congress vouches, who asserts that he has attempted to do just exactly what the Pension Office would require, to wit, to find the evidence of his comrades or officers, and that he can not do it. Now, it is not a very hard thing to imagine an old man out in Indiana who has lost all his relatives, who has drifted away from his comrades, and is, so to speak, isolated, and here is a man seventy-two years of age, in regard to whom we are asked to assume that he is committing perjury for this paltry pension—a man who has to go around holding himself together with a truss! I do not believe it is such an extraordinary case that we can not do justice to it here. The trouble is that we do not do justice to the soldiers, and we need not be alarmed about making a mistake if it is on the right side. We know two things in this case; first, that the man was sound when he went into the service; and, second, that he is unsound now.

Mr. KERR. How do you know that?

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. First by his own statement, and second by the statement of his Representative on this floor.

Mr. KERR. Let him go and make his statement to the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. He can just as well make it here. We have the power to pass laws here. That is what we are here for.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to be able to agree with our distinguished chairman [Mr. MATSON]. The Committee on Invalid Pensions does not make unfavorable reports in cases that justify favorable ones. There is one other thing which I think the chairman of the committee forgot to state; that is, that there is a rule in the Committee on Invalid Pensions that they will not take action in cases that have not been submitted to the Pension Office where there is any reasonable ground for such submission. They absolutely refuse to give such a case consideration in the committee unless there be some special reason why it should not have been submitted to the Pension Office; or, if submitted, why favorable action could not be obtained. This case comes under that rule of the committee, and I think they were justified in their action, and that this bill ought not to pass.

Mr. STRUBLE. Has not that rule been followed by the committee in the action in this case?

Mr. GALLINGER. It has.

Mr. CHEADLE. One word more, Mr. Chairman. To-night, contrary to the law of the land, a bill has been passed—I will not say how—to increase the pension of a widow from $50 to $100 a month, and, after the technicalities of the law have been thus disregarded here, I appeal to the members of this committee to say whether, when a Representative upon this floor makes such a statement as I have made in regard to this case and when an old soldier, who was disabled in the service and who says that he is unable to make the technical proof that is required in the Pension Office, comes into this tribunal of the people and asks for a pension, his claim is to be disregarded? I want to see if this House, which has this very night increased a pension contrary to law, will deny a hearing to Joseph W. McConnell, an old man, seventy-two years of age, who must have been forty-five years old when the war broke out, and who is now an invalid as the result of his service, or whether they will say to the Commissioner of Pensions: "Have this man examined and pension him according to the ratings of the law."

The CHAIRMAN. What motion does the gentleman submit?

Mr. CHEADLE. That this bill be laid aside to be reported favorably, notwithstanding the adverse report of the committee.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CHEADLE, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 16, noes 23.

The question then recurred on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House adversely; which was agreed to.

JESSE M. STILWELL.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6371) granting a pension to Jesse M. Stilwell.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions adversely.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask that the bill be passed over, retaining its place.

Mr. MATSON. I think I can please the gentleman better. I propose to ask the House to pass this bill, notwithstanding the adverse report. I neglected to notify my colleague, as I intended to do, that the committee has reconsidered its report in this case, and now recommends favorable action.

Mr. CHEADLE. It is a meritorious case.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and instructed to place the name of Jesse M. Stilwell, of Lionsville, Boone County, Indiana, late of Company A of the Seventieth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, upon the pension-roll, at the rate of $16 a month, subject to the regulations of the Pension Department.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was as follows:

The claimant in this case filed declaration May 6, 1885, alleging that while at or near Stevenson, Ala., about December 24, 1863, he was struck in the small of the back by a comrade, Joseph E. Carr, with a hickory stick, which greatly disabled him and still disables him. The claim was rejected on the ground that the alleged injury to back was not received in the line of duty, and was not due to the service in contemplation of law, under ruling 133. From this decision an appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Interior, who says:

"It is shown that appellant was off duty and in front of his tent in camp when assaulted by Joseph E. Carr, another soldier, and the disability alleged to have been incurred was in no manner incident to or connected with his military duty as a soldier; therefore he was not in the line of duty as contemplated by the pension law, and the action of rejection is not error and should not be disturbed."

The decision in this case has also been affirmed by the President in a veto message recently sent to Congress, and the committee therefore submit an adverse report and recommend that the bill do lie upon the table.

Mr. MATSON. This is a case where a man was injured while sitting in his tent. After he had come off guard duty and while he was engaged in preparing to go to bed—taking off his shoes—a comrade struck him without warning and without provocation. In the original examination of the case there seemed to be some circumstances pointing in the direction of a quarrel, but after careful investigation I became satisfied there was nothing of that kind in the case, and so reported to the committee, which directed me to make a favorable report to the House.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions adversely, were severally laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that they be indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 1007) granting a pension to John S. Coleman;

A bill (S. 2447) granting a pension to Mary J. Goslee;

A bill (S. 2330) granting increase of pension to William Gallagher;

A bill (S. 776) granting an increase of pension to John Moore; and

A bill (S. 2084) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Joseph Lews.

SUSAN SINGLETON.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. MATSON) was the bill (H. R. 9130) granting a pension to Susan Singleton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan Singleton, dependent mother of Dudley P. Singleton, late a private in Company H, Fifty-ninth Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

Claimant was the dependent mother of Dudley P. Singleton, a private of Company H, Fifty-ninth Indiana Volunteers, who died in Memphis Hospital in January, 1863, of measles contracted in the service and in line of duty. Claimant filed her application for pension as dependent mother March 5, 1879, which was rejected on the ground of nondependence at the time of soldier's death.

The evidence shows that the time the soldier died claimant's husband was possessed of a farm which was of little value, and that by reason of sickness from the date of his son's death up until his own the value of his earnings per month could not exceed $5, and that the value of his property would not exceed $800, and at his death was divided among his heirs, and that the value of the property of claimant would not exceed $250.

There are many affidavits of neighbors who have known the claimant for twenty years, who testify to her present helpless condition. She is now sixty-six years of age, broken in health, without any means of support, and requires the aid and attention of another person.

Your committee believe the claim to be a meritorious one and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JULIA A. RHOADS.

The next business on the Private Calendar (called up by Mr. BYNUM) was the bill (S. 842) granting a pension to Julia A. Rhoads.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Julia A. Rhoads, widow of James R. Rhoads, a soldier in the late war of the rebellion.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) was read, as follows:

The claimant is the widow of James R. Rhodes, who was drafted some time in September, 1864, and reported at Camp Carrington, Indianapolis, where he remained some time. While there he was taken sick, as alleged, from exposure, which resulted in a severe cold and an affection of the kidneys. November 14, 1864, he furnished a substitute and went home sick, where he remained under the care of a physician, when he died.

He was never mustered into any company or regiment, for the reason, probably, that he was unable to do military duty for the causes above stated; but the records of the War Department show that he was drafted and furnished a substitute after he was prostrated by sickness. He was treated while in camp by a surgeon whose name is unknown; and Dr. Allen testifies that he was laboring under disease of kidneys after his return home, and was treated therefor until he died. He says "he became delirious and unconscious before death from uræmic poison, and died from that cause, the result of disease of the kidneys." The marriage is fully proven; and it is shown that he was a man of good health before and at the time he was drafted into the service.

We believe that the bill ought to pass, and therefore submit a favorable report.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. WISE. I ask the gentleman to yield a moment to me.

Mr. MORRILL. Regular order.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the special order, had directed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

LOUISE PAUL.

Mr. CHEADLE. I ask unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider and lay on the table the vote by which the bill of the Senate No. 749, granting a pension to Louise Paul, was passed be withdrawn.

Mr. LAFFOON. I object.

Mr. CHEADLE. Then I want to say this——

Mr. MORRILL. Regular order.

Mr. CHEADLE. I rise to a question of privilege. I have raised on a Friday night session the question of a quorum on this bill, and it went over to a full House. It was brought up and considered to-night when a quorum was not present. I desire this statement to go on record.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, were considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 4504) granting a pension to Nancy Baldwin;

A bill (H. R. 3055) for the relief of A. F. St. Sure Lindefelt;

A bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey;

A bill (H. R. 9672) granting a pension to Eliza A. Williamson;
A bill (H. R. 9263) granting a pension to Abraham J. Buckles;
A bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant;
A bill (H. R. 6371) granting a pension to Jesse M. Stillwell; and
A bill (H. R. 9130) granting a pension to Susan Singleton.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were considered, the amendments adopted, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed, namely:

A bill (H. R. 5123) to increase the pension of Charles Ritchey;
A bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge;
A bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh; and
A bill (H. R. 9358) to increase the pension of Rosalie O'Sullivan.

EMANUEL H. CUSTER.

The bill (H. R. 9387) for the relief of Emanuel H. Custer, reported from the Committee of the Whole with the recommendation that the previous question be considered as ordered thereon, and that the bill be fixed as a special order for consideration on the 26th instant, with the right of debate for fifteen minutes on each side, was considered, the recommendation concurred in, and the order made in accordance therewith.

ADVERSE REPORT.

The bill (H. R. 3544) granting a pension to Joseph W. McConnell, reported from the Committee of the Whole with an adverse recommendation, was ordered to be laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS PASSED.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole without amendment, were severally considered, ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, were passed, namely:

A bill (S. 2105) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Verbisky;
A bill (S. 692) granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams;
A bill (S. 2652) granting a pension to Gustave E. Peters;
A bill (S. 1629) granting a pension to Erastus B. Burnham;
A bill (S. 1867) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary L. Ristine;
A bill (S. 1716) granting a pension to Mary L. Williams;
A bill (S. 896) for the relief of Mrs. Louise Silvers;
A bill (S. 1110) granting a pension to Mrs. Fredericka Hauser;
A bill (S. 1884) granting a pension to Louise Provost; and
A bill (S. 842) granting a pension to Julia A. Rhoads.

The following Senate bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, were considered, the amendments adopted, and the bills as amended ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, were passed, namely:

A bill (S. 2033) granting a pension to Joseph Wirth;
A bill (S. 888) granting a pension to Mercy A. Cutts; and
A bill (S. 734) granting a pension to James Hale.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1000) to increase the pension of certain soldiers who are utterly helpless from injuries received or diseases contracted while in the service of the United States; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

BILLS REPORTED ADVERSELY.

Senate bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with an adverse recommendation, were considered and ordered to be indefinitely postponed, namely:

A bill (S. 1007) granting a pension to John S. Colman;
A bill (S. 2447) granting a pension to Mary J. Goslee;
A bill (S. 2330) granting an increase of pension to William Gallagher;
A bill (S. 776) granting an increase of pension to John Moore; and
A bill (S. 2084) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Joseph Lewis.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then (the hour of 10 o'clock and 30 minutes having arrived) the Speaker pro tempore declared the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. HOLMAN: Of Boone and Crockett Club of New York.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 21, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CUSTOMS SERVICE EMPLOYÉS AT NEW YORK.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of May 1, 1888, papers containing certain information in relation to employés in the customs service at the port of New York; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Select Committee to Examine into the Condition of the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 201) to correct an error in the act making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition of citizens of Blue Earth County, Minnesota, praying for the passage of certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRYE. I present the petition of L. H. Moulton and others—where they reside the petition does not indicate—praying for the passage of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EVARTS presented the petition of C. L. Saunders and 17 others, praying for the removal of the duty on tin-plate; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 10318) granting a pension to Mary C. Davis;

A bill (H. R. 8460) to place the name of John J. Mitchell on the pension-roll; and

A bill (H. R. 9314) granting a pension to Mrs. Judith Deig.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10347) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Plattsmouth, Nebr., and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10524) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Chattahoochee River, in the State of Georgia, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10538) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Flint and Chattahoochee Rivers, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10527) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Alabama River, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BLAIR, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 4098) granting a pension to Eliza Trefren;

A bill (H. R. 8506) for the relief of Hannah H. Latham;

A bill (H. R. 7510) granting a pension to Stephen A. Seavey; and

A bill (H. R. 9119) granting a pension to George C. Chase.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 3361) for the relief of George W. Graham; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 3362) to restore to the public domain and to regulate the sale and disposition of certain lands east of the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3363) for the relief of Michael Loeb and Frederick Munzenheimer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EVARTS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 3364) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw, of New York; which was read by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. GIBSON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2952) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman act; which were referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEWART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business, that order is closed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a bill on the Calendar which I should like to have passed. It was reported with unanimity by the Committee on Finance. I refer to the bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] wanted to be here when that was considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator send for him?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will see if he is in the room of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] had previously submitted a motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will let the motion be pending, and pass it over informally until the Senator from Kentucky comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada first took the floor to move the consideration of the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

Mr. STEWART. I understand that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desires to go on with his speech on the fisheries treaty, and if that is the case I ask leave to withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, then, is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Colorado desires now to go on, I shall withdraw my request.

Mr. TELLER. I am willing to have the bill considered if it does not lead to debate.

Mr. DAWES. While the Senator from Ohio is sending for the Senator from Kentucky I should like to call up a matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Kentucky will be here in a minute.

Mr. STEWART. If other business is to go on, I shall insist on my motion to proceed with Senate bill 3304.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to yield the Freedman's Bank bill, as the Senator from Kentucky will be here in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] has priority.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right, then.

Mr. HOAR. What has become of the fisheries treaty?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaty is pending before the Senate in open executive session whenever it is moved. Does the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. STEWART. No, I ask that Senate bill 3304 be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3304) to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

Mr. HOAR. A motion to go into open executive session is in order?

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to give way for that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senator from Alabama the floor?

Mr. MORGAN. I have on the business that is now about to be taken up by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable under the rules. The Senator can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. DAWES. Does a motion to go into executive session on the treaty take precedence of the motion of the Senator from Nevada?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion has not yet been made.

Mr. DAWES. I make the motion, if it will take precedence.

Mr. MORGAN. The Chair anticipated my desire. I did not rise to debate the motion. I suppose the business that is now proposed to be taken up is the regular business of the Senate at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The unfinished business at 2 o'clock would be the bill now moved by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. DAWES. I make the motion——

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair.

Mr. PLATT. Is not the unfinished business the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was mistaken. Senate bill No. 12 was laid aside informally and therefore its consideration was resumed at the close of yesterday's session, and that will be the unfinished business at 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. DAWES. I make the motion that we proceed to the consideration of executive business on the treaty in open session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and the fisheries treaty in open executive session.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Massachusetts, I think, will concur with me in asking for a few minutes of executive session with closed doors. There is a matter that calls for attention, and I therefore make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts modify his motion?

Mr. DAWES. I do.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 692) granting an increase of pension to Enoch G. Adams;

A bill (S. 749) granting a pension to Louise Paul;

A bill (S. 842) granting a pension to Julia A. Rhoads;

A bill (S. 896) for the relief of Mrs. Louise Silvers;

A bill (S. 1110) granting a pension to Mrs. Fredericka Hauser;

A bill (S. 1629) granting a pension to Erastus B. Burnham;

A bill (S. 1716) granting a pension to Mary L. Williams;

A bill (S. 1867) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary L. Ristine;

A bill (S. 1884) granting a pension to Louise Provost;

A bill (S. 2105) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Verbisky; and

A bill (S. 2652) granting a pension to Gustave E. Peters.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 1734) granting a pension to James Hale;

A bill (S. 888) granting a pension to Mercy A. Cutts;

A bill (S. 1450) for the relief of Maj. Gen. W. W. Averell; and

A bill (S. 2033) granting a pension to Joseph Wirth.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2972) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Alfred Pleasonton, with the rank and grade of colonel, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. HOOKER, Mr. TOWNSHEND, and Mr. GEAR managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers; and

A bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 431) granting a pension to Emma S. Free, widow of Thomas S. Free, late major of the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. 3008) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury;

A bill (H. R. 6153) to authorize condemnation of land for sites of public buildings, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 8180) to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 8183) for the erection of a public building at Opelousas, La.; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts and officials, to the city of Utica, N. Y.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] will allow me, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that we may proceed to consider and finish the bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] is present, and says he is in favor of the bill. It will take but a moment, I think, to pass it.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection unless it leads to debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it leads to debate, or if any Senator objects to the passage of the bill, modified as it is, I shall not press it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We are in executive session, I believe, Mr. President, with open doors.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be done by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It creates great embarrassment in journalizing to have these irregular proceedings in open executive session or closed executive session. If there be no objection, the Chair will hold that there is unanimous consent given for the consideration of legislative business, and the Senator from Ohio will be recognized.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1138) to reimburse the depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company for losses incurred by the failure of said company.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 11, after the word "representatives," to insert "as hereinafter provided;" so as to read:

That the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, and his successors in office, be, and the same are hereby, authorized and directed to pay, or cause to be paid, under such regulations as said commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, to all depositors of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company whose accounts have been properly verified and balanced under existing laws, or to their legal representatives, as hereinafter provided, a sum of money equal to the verified balances due said depositors from said company at the time of its failure, less the amount of dividends which have been or may be declared from the assets of said company.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to be informed a little about this bill. Who is "the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company?"

Mr. SHERMAN. The Comptroller of the Currency is that officer. There was formerly an independent officer; Mr. Leopold held the office; but those duties have been imposed on the Comptroller of the Currency for a number of years.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I supposed; but my doubt was whether the Comptroller of the Currency is the commissioner or whether the duty of the commissioner has merely been transferred to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is so understood. The bill was framed in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BECK. A report was made to us which shows that the Comptroller of the Currency is the commissioner and was made so by law. I have sent for the report and will get it in a few minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If made so by law, then the phraseology of the bill is probably right; but if the duties of commissioner were merely transferred to him as Comptroller of the Currency, then the language of the bill does not appear to be adequate to the purpose. The first two lines of it are probably right as they are, because it takes in "the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company and his successors in office;" but the next provision is confined entirely to the action of the commissioner himself, and it depends upon the precise nature of his office. I do not want to interfere with the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. That duty was conferred upon him by law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The duties were conferred upon him, but the point is as to the title.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill was prepared in the Treasury Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator in charge of the bill says that the Comptroller of the Currency is the commissioner of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company, so that I have nothing further to say on that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in line 16, after the word "million," to strike out "two hundred thousand;" and in line 26, after the word "representatives," to insert "as hereinafter provided;" so as to read:

And for this purpose the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, said amount to be placed in the Treasury to the credit of said commissioner by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purposes in this act specified, but no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid to any assignee of any such depositors, and the benefit and relief provided by this act shall extend only to those depositors in whose favor such balances have been properly verified, and to their heirs and legal representatives, as hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill:

No payment shall be made under the provisions of this act to any person without the commissioners being first satisfied that the person receiving the same is the original depositor, entitled to the same under the provisions of this act, or the widow, children, or grandchildren, if there be any; if not, then to the father or mother, if any; and if not, then to the brothers and sisters, if any, and none other shall inherit. The money herein appropriated shall be applied only to the payment of the claims of such persons in whole or in part of African descent, whose accounts have been properly verified and balanced under existing laws.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to be informed why this race distinction is made in the amendment. If there was a lawful depositor who can not prove that he or she in whole or in part was of African descent, why should a discrimination be made against him?

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer is that the law itself which created this institution made the distinction. No one really is entitled to the benefits of the law, and no one was entitled to deposit money in the Freedman's Bank by express provision except he was of African descent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, in order to get rid of the "race" business, and still cover the point of the Senator so as to give the money only to those who were lawful depositors, I move to amend the amendment in line 34, by inserting before the word "original" the word "lawful," so that it will only cover those who were entitled to deposit in the bank. Then I shall move to strike out the words in line 40, "in whole or in part of African descent."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting that question the Chair will ask the Senator from Ohio whether the word "commissioners," at the end of line 32, should be in the singular or plural?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It should be in the possessive case.

Mr. SHERMAN. That amendment was prepared by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a mere misprint in point of punctuation. It is printed in the plural, "commissioners." It is intended to be in the possessive case, so as to read "without the commissioner" or "commissioner's being first satisfied." "Commissioner" would be the best form of the word. It is a typographical mistake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The typographical change will be made.

Mr. SHERMAN. As to the language of the original law, the Senator from Kentucky, I think, has that before him.

Mr. BECK. No, I think not. I sent for it, but received a general statement without the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. The original act limited the benefits of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company to persons of African descent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I take that for granted, and accordingly move to reach that point of only paying the lawful depositors by putting in the word "lawful" before "original." If that is agreed to, I shall then move to strike out the words "in whole or in part of African descent," and that will give the lawful depositors who make proof the money.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the beginning of line 34 insert the word "lawful," so as to read:

Without the commissioner being first satisfied that the person receiving the same is the lawful original depositor.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 40, after the word "persons," strike out the words "in whole or in part of African descent;" so as to read:

The money herein appropriated shall be applied only to the payment of the claims of such persons whose accounts have been properly verified and balanced under existing laws.

Mr. BECK. I hope those words will not be stricken out, if for no other purpose than to make it perfectly certain what is the intention of the proposed law. The original act limited depositors to persons of African descent, and so did one or two amendments of that act which were afterwards made. Subsequently a number of white men became depositors and ran the bank, and ran it to destruction, which is at the bottom of all the trouble we are now in.

If the words "in whole or in part of African descent" be stricken out and the phrase "lawful depositor" retained, it will be a question whether the very men who brought all the trouble upon the bank, who were themselves the principal beneficiaries, while the original colored depositors were ruined and only got 62 per cent. of the whole, will not insist that they, too, having balanced their books with two-thirds of the whole amount outstanding, shall be the principal beneficiaries.

The committee were endeavoring to guard against that by inserting these words at the suggestion of Mr. Trenholm himself, who is the commissioner, as shown by his statement, so as to limit it strictly to the purpose of the original law and to the only persons to whom we are bound to make it good.

The only reason why the United States is in equity bound to make good the deposits is because those colored people believed that it was a Government institution, managed by Government officers, and run for their benefit. Their money was deposited upon the faith of that, and as they have lost, none of them being very large depositors, indeed all very small, perhaps $50 being away above the average, the white men should not by any construction or misconstruction of the law be entitled to set up their claims. We make it good to the colored people and then we have done our duty.

The bill as amended is drawn so as to meet the views of the commissioner, and the committee were very careful in endeavoring to limit it to the proper beneficiaries and to extend it no further. Striking out those words which have been inserted would beyond all question cause all the white depositors to claim that they come in under the bill, which we did not intend should be the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have done my duty.

Mr. HOAR. I waive the call. I understood there was to be a division, and I thought that that would be in contravention of the spirit of the arrangement under which the bill was taken up. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the author of the bill what distinguishes this from any other banking institution of the country? If we pay the depositors of this institution for the losses that they have incurred by the failure of the institution, why should we not pay all other depositors of all other banking institutions chartered under the authority of the United States?

I confess, sir, that I can see no reason for it, and before I vote upon the bill, disposing of over a million dollars of money to make good the defalcations of some dishonest men connected with this institution, I should be glad to have a reason given to me for a vote in its favor.

Mr. SHERMAN. That reason has been given so often to the Senator in committee and in the Senate that the Senator will pardon me for not repeating it. The reasons have been given as growing out of the peculiar institution and the peculiar circumstances connected with the institution. It is not necessary to repeat them here.

Mr. VANCE. I have not received the answer to my question that I expected and hoped that I would get. The Senator contents himself by saying that the reasons have been given so often in committee that he declines to give them publicly.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator does not quite quote what I said. I said they have been given so often in committee and in the Senate that it is not necessary to repeat them. When this subject was discussed the other day by the Senate there were quite a number of gentlemen on that side of the Chamber and on this side who gave reasons why the bill should pass, although it would not be a good rule for us to pay all depositors of broken national banks.

Mr. VANCE. I was not present when the discussion was had in the Senate. I was not aware that one had taken place.

The peculiar circumstances seem to be that the colored people were the wards of the nation, I suppose, and that they were led to believe that this was a Government institution managed by Government officers, and that the faith of the Government was pledged to make good their deposits, and to see that they were properly treated, etc.

The kindest and the best thing that can be done with the colored race in this country is to teach them to depend upon themselves. The ward business began at a very early period. It is time that they should either be the wards of the nation or that they should be independent freemen, learning to depend upon themselves and not to depend upon the Government—one or the other.

As wards it is assumed that these persons were so ignorant that they did not know the risk they were running when they deposited their money in a chartered institution; that they believed, in their trusting and implicit ignorance, that they were to be taken care of by the faith of the nation, and that everything that had the Government of the United States attached to it meant a solemn guaranty to them of their rights and privileges and property, etc.

That has all gone by, sir, and at the same time that we are now asked, in consideration of their ignorant condition, their condition of inchoate citizenship, to make good all the losses incurred in this bank, they were as freemen thought to be wise enough and statesmanlike enough and freemen enough to intrust with the destinies of whole States in this country, to take charge of the laws, the property, the rights, the liberties and the civilization of my State for one, and of many others, and were placed over the heads of the white people in those governments. If they were able and sufficiently enlightened to take charge of the destinies of a free, civilized Commonwealth, surely they were able to deposit their money in a banking institution and to take the risks there like any one else.

To hold them as wards wherever a defalcation of a bank is to be made good, and to hold them as enlightened and civilized freemen wherever a political purpose is to be maintained by giving them full charge of a whole State and its destinies, I think is entirely inconsistent.

When this bill was introduced it contained a general provision to make good all the depositors who had not been satisfied by the assets of the bank. It turned out that quite a number of those depositors were white people. Now, the bill is amended so as to strike them out, and we are absolutely to make a distinction in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which says that no distinction shall be made on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. We are to pay the colored man all that he was robbed of by the officers of this bank, and the white man is to look out for himself and gets nothing because he should have known better.

Sir, the whole business is wrong. These colored people must learn to distinguish in their business risks just as the white people have learned to distinguish. They must learn the great truth that every man who calls himself a philanthropist and friend of the colored man is not necessarily so, and that the louder in fact he talks philanthropy and love of them the more likely he is to steal what they intrust to him. They have that lesson to learn. If one is to be paid I am in favor of paying the other. There is no justice in any other course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time.

Mr. VANCE. Let us have the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator wants the yeas and nays I would rather that the bill should go over until Monday. I am afraid too many Senators are absent. I hope the Senator will withdraw the demand and let the bill take its course.

Mr. VANCE. I have no objection to withdrawing the demand for the yeas and nays. I supposed that a quorum was present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt very much whether there is a quorum, on account of the number of pairs. There is more than a quorum present in the Senate, for I have counted, but on account of the pairs and so forth there might be difficulty in getting a quorum on the call of the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask unanimous consent to have considered at this time the bill (S. 1465) for the erection of a public building in the city of Chicago, Ill. It will provoke no discussion, and will not take more than a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] being entitled to the floor, is there objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TELLER. I do not object, unless it leads to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys of the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of erecting upon the lot, already owned by the United States of America, on the corner of Hamson and Sherman streets, in the said city of Chicago, a Government building, to be used as an appraiser's warehouse and for other offices required by the officers or agents of the United States of America in said city of Chicago.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSIDERATION OF BRIDGE BILLS.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MANDERSON. I merely wish to make a request.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw the call for a moment.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply desire to make a request for unanimous consent. There are on the Calendar a large number of bridge bills, mostly House bills, favorably reported by the Committee on Commerce. I know that in the case of several bridges that span the Missouri River, on the boundary of my own State, it is important that those bills should become laws at the earliest day, so as to get the advantage of this season for construction. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] those bills shall be taken up in their order and receive the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the observations of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] on the fisheries treaty the Senate proceed to consider the bridge bills favorably reported upon the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I suppose those bills will be subject to objection?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly; that would be understood. They will be under the eighth rule and subject to objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under Rule VIII.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask for unanimous consent for the proposition I have made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands there is no objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska, and it is so ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bills being subject to objection under Rule VIII.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. VEST. I rise to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill for the erection of a public building at Chicago just passed. I must make the confession that I have no recollection that I consented to the passage of this bill, except in an informal sort of way. There has been no meeting of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for some time, the chairman being absent in Europe; and the custom has grown up of asking Senators on the floor if they will agree to report certain bills, and, as I am a very good-natured gentleman, I suppose I consented; but I notice that this bill has none of the restrictions and safeguards which are usually put in such bills.

Mr. FARWELL. What bill is the Senator speaking of?

Mr. VEST. The bill for the erection of a public building in the city of Chicago which we have just passed.

Mr. FARWELL. I can explain it in a moment.

Mr. VEST. I have no doubt the object is entirely a proper one and that the building ought to be erected, but we have certain rules in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds which restrict the erection of these buildings. There is no provision here that this shall be done according to the plans of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department; there is no provision that a certain space shall be left between this and other buildings, which we always require in the interest of the United States so as to protect the building from fire.

Mr. FARWELL. That is all provided for in this case by Mr. Freret.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be in the bill.

Mr. VEST. It is not in the bill; and according to the rule of our committee we require those limitations. They are absolutely necessary. We can not trust these matters to any public architect, no matter how worthy a person he is, and we have never done so. I do not want to obstruct the bill, except that I suggest to my friend that the bill be reconstructed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri enter a motion to reconsider?

Mr. VEST. I enter a motion to reconsider, and then we can fix the bill up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 1465) for the erection of a public building in the city of Chicago, Ill., was passed, will be entered.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. DOLPH. Is a conference report in order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Conference reports are privileged.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before I call for the regular order, I move that that conference report be printed so that we can see exactly what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know to what conference report the Senator from Vermont refers. The title of the bill on which the conference report submitted by the Senator from Oregon is made will be reported by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that this report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Senate resumes the consideration, by unanimous consent, of the fisheries treaty as in open executive session. The Senator from Colorado is entitled to the floor.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senate and I congratulate the country that we approach the discussion of this case from what I consider a proper business standpoint; that we are discussing this question in the presence of the whole American people; that we, the agents of the people, are giving our reasons for and against this treaty, the reasons that shall govern our votes, in their hearing, and in so doing we are recognizing our obligation to them.

The Senators who have favored this treaty have, without exception I believe in this discussion, alluded to the fact that we had taken, or were taking, into our councils not only the American people, but all the people of Great Britain interested in this subject, and the Senators who have favored by their speeches in this Chamber the ratification of this treaty have been pronounced in their opinion that such discussion in open session was contrary to the great interests of the American people. They have put it, I suppose, on the ground that we are notifying the English Government of the weakness of our case. The President of the United States notified the people of Great Britain of the weakness of our case in his message to the Senate. The Secretary of State, in his communication to the President and in his public utterances made from time to time, either by letter or in public speeches, or in interviews through the newspapers, has given the English-speaking people of the world to understand that this treaty is more than we are entitled to under the convention of 1818. Sir, when the English people and the American people shall attempt to negotiate another convention, they will not refer to the speeches made in this Chamber in support of the proposition that the offers made in this treaty are all that we are entitled to and more, but they will recur to the official language of the Executive of the nation, to the official language of the Secretary of State; and it is folly to say that this treaty can not be discussed in the open Senate by the American Senate for fear that our utterances will be used against this Government hereafter when the Executive and the Department of the Government charged with this branch of the public service have been so free with their utterances, both official and otherwise.

I notice, I think, that every Senator who approaches this subject from the other side has declared his objection to its discussion in public. I notice also that every Senator who has approached the subject from that side at least has declared that inasmuch as the discussion was to be in open Senate it should be free and it should be full, and that so far as he was concerned there should be no withholding from the public and from the world the views that were entertained of this subject; and yet when we have got these declarations of the several Senators who have addressed the Senate we have discovered nothing that might not have been proclaimed from the housetops. We have heard nothing that the President had not already said; we have heard nothing that the Secretary of State had not said; we have heard nothing that had not been said by the public press of the Democratic party in defense of this treaty.

So, Mr. President, after all, while I admit that this case is sui generis, while I admit that it does not stand in its relations to a public discussion on the same basis with some of the treaties we make, while I admit that there are reasons for the public discussion of this treaty that do not exist as to all others, I think it may be said that this instance has demonstrated at least that no danger will come to the Republic by an open discussion of a treaty in the United States Senate in the presence of the sixty-odd millions of American people. It has been discussed in Great Britain; it has been discussed in Canada; it has been ratified, I understand, by the Canadian government, ratified and approved by the British Government.

I believe I will mention the fact, as my attention is called to it by the Senator from Vermont who sits in front of me [Mr. EDMUNDS], that it had the unanimous approval when the vote was taken of the Canadian Parliament. I have not been informed and am not able to state because I do not know and have not heard of any objection to this treaty that was made in the British Parliament.

The Senator who first addressed the Senate on this subject on the other side was free to talk about the influence of caucus. He told us that there was a caucus combination to bring the Senate first to reject the treaty and then to consider it in open session. Now, I venture to say that neither the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] nor any other Senator can point to a Senator on this side of the Chamber who has ever at any time given any intimation that he proposed to support this treaty; and inasmuch as this question of caucus domination and caucus control has been freely discussed by at least three Senators on the other side, I propose to say that that point was never discussed in our caucus. The Republican party, indeed, were against this treaty from its very first publication.

I may say more, that a great many Senators sitting on the other side of the Chamber were likewise against it at its first publication. The Republican Senators; I say, without exception were against it, and a very respectable number of the Senators on the other side were against it.

I understand that the Senators on the other side also caucused about this matter. They caucused as to whether they would discuss it in open session, and I believe a very considerable number of them advocated in caucus and voted in caucus—as we were told by a Democratic Senator in executive session, the proceedings of which have been made public, and of which I have a right to speak—in favor of its discussion in the open Senate.

A Senator in my hearing suggests that it is safe to say that two-thirds of the American Senate were opposed to this treaty. Mr. President, I said in executive session, and I repeat it here, that if this treaty had come from a Republican administration I do not believe there is a Republican on this side of the Chamber who would have supported it, and I know that there is not a Democrat on that side of the Chamber who would have supported it if it had not come from a Democratic administration; and I know more than that, that there is not any considerable number of Senators on that side of the Chamber who would have supported this treaty but for the fact that the power of the Administration was brought upon that body to compel support of this treaty.

If any Senator desires proof that the Administration is the active propagandist of this treaty, I will furnish it. If not, I think I can rest upon the general assertion. Surely when you see the Secretary of State writing letters for publication, when you see the members of this commission, who were connected with the Administration, making public addresses in its defense and support, when you find the Secretary of State submitting to newspaper interviews in order that he may give the public his views of this treaty, I do not need to go to further proof to show that the whole force of this Administration has been brought to bear to compel the Democratic Senators and the Democratic party to accept this as a Democratic measure.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] attempted to give a history of the way in which this treaty came into open session. Now, I may say in the presence of my fellow-Senators of my side, that I was perhaps as active as any man on our side in bringing this question before the open Senate, and I think I am not mistaken as to how this matter stood. The Senator from Alabama said, as I recollect, that there had been originally forty-one votes in favor of its discussion in secret, and three only in favor of its discussion in the open Senate, the three consisting of the Senator who sits on my left, from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and myself. No member of the Senate has forgotten that when that proposition came before the Senate in secret session the Senator from Alabama declared in substance that if this treaty was to be attacked by the Republican Senators as a treaty as a whole, without amendment, he was in favor of its discussion in open Senate. I would say that there were several Senators, including the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], and others, who had always voted in favor of open sessions who were not here when that vote was taken. I will say further that when the Republican caucus voted upon this question there were only three men in it who voted against the open discussion of this treaty.

I know that several of the Senators put it upon the ground that the case was sui generis. I know several of them reserved for themselves the right to insist that this was not a precedent binding on them in the future. But upon this question we were practically unanimous. The Senator knows very well, as do all the Senators who were in that executive session, that that vote was not a test whether this treaty should be discussed in open session or not. He knows very well that the Democratic side of the Senate were presented to us in the attitude of being ready to go into open executive session if we did not propose to amend the treaty. He knows it was said then and there by a number of Senators on this side that the treaty was of such a character that no amendment could be properly made to it, I myself saying in executive session that it was a treaty unfit to be amended, and incapable of being amended to be consistent and harmonious with the purpose and object declared by the State Department. So, Mr. President, the Republican Senators are not in condition to be criticised or castigated on this account.

Then came later the vote in executive session by which practically the whole matter was decided by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. When that vote was taken, at least six men on the other side of the Chamber voted with us for an open session. When they saw that the Republicans meant open session (which they did not believe before), then these six withdrew their votes before the result was announced. Included in that number are some of the Senators who are to-day criticising us for discussing this question in open Senate.

So, Mr. President, we are here to discuss this question as I believe all questions of this kind ought to be discussed, where we can face the sentiment of the American people; and since the discussion has begun I believe there has been practically but one sentiment in the country upon this treaty. Although the attempt has been made by the Administration to commit the Democratic party to it, it has met with very little success, for with the exception perhaps of a few persons in certain sections, there has been no interest in its ratification expressed by anybody.

The question of our fishery rights on the northern coast is not a small question, and it is not a local question. The people of Colorado who never avail themselves of these rights have as much interest in them in one sense as the people of Maine, Massachusetts, or any of the New England States. So far as they concern our honor, our dignity, and our rights they have the same interest in them as any other citizens can have, although they may have a pecuniary benefit in the use of the property belonging to the United States, for that is what this fishery claim is.

We in the Western country would not be willing that the United States should part with its rights and its privileges because we receive no pecuniary benefit, because we can not start out fishing smacks and fishing fleets. If the fishery is a right that belongs to the people of the United States we want it maintained, and we are in favor of its maintenance, as we are in favor of maintaining every other right.

We recognize the fact that when the treaty of 1783 was made there were three things that stood out paramount in that treaty. First, our independence; second, the establishment of our boundaries; and third, and not least closely connected therewith, our fishery rights; and we should as quickly think of surrendering a portion of the State of Maine at the dictation or the bidding of British greed as we would think of surrendering a single foot of fishing ground that properly belongs to the nation. And I am glad to say that we do not belong to the class of men who purchase peace by the surrender of that which is unquestionably ours. Willing always as we are, as are all the American people, to concede questions of doubtful authority, of a doubtful character, we are never to be intimidated by threats of war or suggestions of difficulties that will be incurred in the maintenance of that which we all agree rightfully belongs to us.

Mr. President, Great Britain might call upon us to surrender a piece of Maine that would be so small and so worthless as to be insignificant in comparison with the great cost it would be to us to insist upon our rights by war, and yet is there anywhere in this country a citizen so mean and of so little spirit that he would surrender an acre of the rocks of New England at the demand of Great Britain or of all the world? And if so, why should we surrender that which is of equal value and the surrender of which would be equal degradation and disgrace?

Mr. President, we came to these fishery rights exactly as we came to our boundary rights, exactly as we came to our territorial boundaries, exactly as we came to our independence. It has been said again and again that there is not a rod of that country that our ancestors had not fought for. If Great Britain succeeded in dominating that northern sea and compelling her great rival of that time to yield to her it was because the American fisherman made it possible, and made it possible too when British love of peace was in favor of its surrender.

If there is a great British dominion growing up upon our Northern border, it is because the New England fishermen, prior to the Revolution, made it possible for Great Britain to build and rear this great political structure on our north. And so, when our ancestors came to this question, they did not say to Britain, "We want you should give us this;" they said, "It is ours of right;" and from that day to this there has never been anybody until it has been heard in this Senate—and that, too, within the last two months—who has denied our right. The right of Great Britain has been uniformly considered exactly as that of a copartner, a cotenant, the United States and Great Britain being owners in common. These terms have all been used again and again by American authorities in the defense of our rights. Nay, they have never been denied. No English authority has ever questioned our rights as equal in all respects except as we surrendered them by the treaty of 1818, and what we did not there surrender is ours to this day as much as it ever was, not by virtue of a treaty any more than our independence is conceded by virtue of a treaty, not any more by treaty than the boundaries fixed between Great Britain's dominion on this continent and ours were fixed by treaty.

In 1818 we modified the treaty of 1783. We surrendered some things that were ours, but, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] showed, not without consideration in return. We gave up some things and we got others that were considered then an equivalent. It was not, as has been said, a surrender; it was not a yielding, for the American people at that time were not in the habit of surrendering that which belonged to them. They had gone to war with Great Britain for the purpose of denying a right that the British asserted, the right of search by sea; and when the war was over, and when this question came to be settled, our people insisted that we were, so far as the fisheries were concerned, as we had been before, and when the negotiations were going on for the subsequent treaty it was everywhere insisted in the United States that we would not surrender an inch of territory, nor would we surrender a single privilege that was ours under the treaty of 1783.

Nobody who has studied this question can forget the letter of Mr. Adams which he wrote to Mr. Madison, in which he said that he would continue the war forever before he would surrender the fisheries. We never did surrender. We exchanged with the British for what privileges we did not have under the treaty of 1783; we took some that we did not have, and we gave up some that we did have. And from that time up to 1830, a period of twelve years, there does not appear anywhere in history that I can find an instance where our rights were questioned or doubted to be exactly what we insist now they are. Practically they were never disputed until 1841 by any authority that was worthy of attention, and practically I might say not seriously until 1843.

Contemporaneous exposition, then, of the treaty of 1818 is on the American side; it is according to our view—a view that has been maintained by everybody connected with this question. Notwithstanding the assertion that the great Secretary of State, Daniel Webster, gave away our case, notwithstanding the assertion made in this Chamber that Edward Everett gave away this case, I assert here without fear of successful contradiction that nothing of the kind can be found, that every act of every administration, from the day the convention of 1818 was ratified up to the time that this treaty was signed, had been in favor of the American idea and the American construction of the treaty of 1818.

Mr. President, in 1841, or perhaps in 1839, one of the British provinces made claim of a character inconsistent with the construction put upon the treaty by the American Government, a claim which practically appears to have slept until about 1843. I do not intend to go into the general headland theory. I do not intend to discuss the question of bays with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], whom I do not see present. It is enough for me to know that all of the public authorities in this country have uniformly held one way upon this subject, and it is enough for me to know that Great Britain, the real and respectable party in the case, had acquiesced in that, and had abandoned practically any claim set up either under the headland theory or the broad-bay theory.

Senators who have preceded me have spoken of the Argus and the Washington cases as having thoroughly and completely established our position. I know the Senator from Delaware who addressed the Senate some time since on this subject insisted that the case of the Washington did not settle anything; and yet the British Government acquiesced in that as a determination not only whether we had a right to fish in the Bay of Fundy, but in all other bays of like character and similarly situated. And if there is any headland theory to-day in existence in the minds of the British authorities, it is because this Administration has revived it; it is because this Administration has brought out from the old rubbish of the past this exploded theory that the right existed to include as British ground all the sea that was within a line drawn from headland to headland, no matter how long it might be or how great. But the American Senate and the American people are not likely to accept this new discovery of this Administration, and are not likely to avail themselves of this old and exploded theory.

Mr. President, from 1843, the time of the decision in the Washington case, down to 1852 there was practical quiet over this disputed question. In 1852 the British Government sent several armed vessels to the northern seas where these issues were liable to arise. In 1850, before this was done, we had overtures from the British Government for reciprocity with Canada. Our people had not taken kindly to the idea, and it was thought perhaps then, as seems to be thought now, that a little coercion would be valuable; that a little pressure might be brought upon us to compel us to yield to their demand, and so a British fleet was sent there with orders to look out for the American fishermen.

The matter came into the American Senate, and I wish to call the attention of the Senate very briefly to some observations then made. The discussion was participated in by the most prominent and leading men of that day, notably by Mr. Rusk, of Texas; Mr. Borland, of Arkansas; Mr. Davis, of Massachusetts; Mr. Toucey, of Connecticut; Mr. Mason, of Virginia; Mr. Hamlin, of Maine; Mr. Cass, of Michigan; Mr. Soulé, of Louisiana, and a great many others.

It was asserted then that some of these vessels had been sent into the Canadian waters for the purpose of intimidating the Government of the United States into the execution of a reciprocity treaty. It is somewhat interesting to compare now with then the utterances of the principal and leading Democrats of this body. To-day I find, so far as there has been any discussion of this question on the Democratic side, every Democratic Senator who has arisen has presented the extreme British view of the case. Every worn-out and exploded theory, every fallacious argument, every absurdity that has been put forth by Canada and repudiated by Great Britain finds its advocates on this floor. And I confess myself to some degree of humiliation when I hear a statement made by a Senator of the United States as to the rights of this Government that is in perfect antagonism to that which has been declared by every Secretary of State who has ever passed upon the question, the present Secretary of State included; and my disgust, if I may use the term properly in this body, is not modified by the fact that each Senator, as he thus advocates British doctrine and the British side of the question, declares with his hand upon his breast that he is actuated and influenced only by the highest patriotism while his opponents are influenced and actuated by only the basest partisan purposes.

Oh, Mr. President, the Democratic party here and elsewhere will not be able to make the American people believe that the long line of honorable men who have been heard upon this question, and who have stood here and advocated the doctrine that we advocate as to the construction of the treaty of 1818, were actuated solely by partisan purposes. Let them explain why it is that they have within a twelvemonth changed their position on this subject, and in so doing are actuated by only high and patriotic resolves.

Now, Mr. President, I will submit without reading all of them some of the remarks made in the Senate in 1852. I wish it would not encumber the RECORD too much to put in all that Lewis Cass said in a speech of great length on this subject. No Democrat rose in the Senate in 1852 to defend the British Government, to apologize for its outrages, or to defend its construction of the treaty of 1818. Nay, more; there was no man of any political faith who did that. It was left for the later day and for the Administration of Grover Cleveland to find men willing to stand here and assert that all their predecessors had been wrong and that we had always been in the wrong and the British Government and the Canadian provinces in their claims had been in the right.

Mr. Borland, of Arkansas, in 1852, said:

It is a remarkable fact that in looking back through the history of our Government, especially to the war period of 1812, and since that time in every dispute or hostile collision with a foreign country, without an exception that now occurs to me, there has been a party in our country and represented in the two Houses of Congress which has invariably taken sides with that foreign country and against our own.—Hon. Solon Borland (Arkansas), July 23, 1852.

Yet, notwithstanding that assertion, I repeat that an examination of the records will show that nobody asserted on this floor, nobody asserted in any branch of the Government that the British construction was right. With one accord those men asserted that it was beneath the dignity of the United States to treat with Great Britain while Great Britain had a hostile fleet on our borders, and with one united voice they declared that it was the duty of the Government of the United States to put in those seas gun for gun and ship for ship. We may be excused to-day from making that assertion or that claim. We can not well do it, and we can not do it because the votes on the other side of the Chamber and the Democratic party as represented in the other branch of Congress for years have rendered it impossible for us so to do.

I now ask to have these extracts from that debate inserted without reading.

DEBATE OF 1852.

The conduct of Great Britain in this business should be met promptly on our side. It is supposed by some Senators to be designed to bring about an enactment for reciprocity of trade on our part with the British colonies. If that be so I will never give a vote for such a measure under such circumstances, no matter what may be the consequences. I will never yield to any threats made by the British Government.

It is said upon the other hand that it is for the purpose of bringing about a negotiation by which the British Government will acquire rights in another quarter similar to those which they have acceded to us on the northern coast, and which we claim there. Sir, is this the way to negotiate?

It is due to ourselves to protect our rights. I would do nothing to bring on war, but I would not submit to this domineering spirit which has manifested itself too much in all the conduct of Great Britain with other nations.—Hon. Thomas J. Rusk (Texas), July 23.

It may be true that the proposition for reciprocal trade between the British colonies and the United States is at the bottom of this. But I ask if such a course as has been pursued is the way to open negotiations with us? Has it ever happened before in the whole history of our country, from the day when our independence was acknowledged by Great Britain until this administration, that negotiations have been opened with us through the medium of cannon pointed against our citizens and our ships? If there be such an instance in our history, I confess my ignorance of it, and I would gladly have remained in ignorance to my dying day that such a thing could be.—Hon. Solon Borland (Arkansas), July 23.

I do not believe that in all the great interests of the country there is one that merits protection more. From that nursery springs the great body of navigators and men of enterprise who adorn and embellish the country. If you take away that protecting arm of the Government you take that which is more essential to you in the defense of the country than any other thing that can be named. The enterprise, the skill, and the courage of these men are manifest as far as our name and fame extend. * * * This is the nursery of the skill and strength which are indispensable to success on the ocean.—Hon. John Davis (Massachusetts), July 23.

I concur most fully in the sentiments of the Senator from Massachusetts, with regard to the magnitude of the fishing industry. It has ever been cherished by the Government and the people of this country, as one of the very highest importance, not only as a profitable employment, but as a nursery for seamen. I feel confident that nothing which has been said, or that will be said in this Senate, will operate adversely to that interest. I must say, however, that if it be proposed to open now a negotiation on that subject under the mouths of British cannon, it is a mode of initiating it that does not commend itself to my judgment as a citizen of this country, or as a member of this Senate. I trust, sir, that no Government of this country will ever open a negotiation in regard to any interest in this exceptionable, and, I may say, humiliating manner.—Hon. Isaac Toucey (Connecticut), July 23.

I know not what these regulations are, but if it means anything it means that we are to negotiate under duress. Aye, sir, at this day that this great people, covering a continent and numbering five and twenty millions, are to negotiate with a foreign fleet on our coast. I know not what the President has done; I claim to know what the American people expect of him. I know that if he has done his duty his reply will be, "I have ordered the whole naval force of the country into those seas to protect the rights of American fishermen against British cannon."—Hon. James M. Mason (Virginia), July 23.

We shall need these men hereafter; we shall need them, as we have needed them, to fight our battles upon the ocean and upon the lakes. * * * When that time shall come it is the American fisherman who will fight your battles, as he fought them in the war of 1812. Then, when the British Government threatened to sweep our little but gallant Navy from the ocean and to annihilate our commerce, it was the fishermen from Marblehead and all along our coast who rallied with patriotic hearts and with ready hands to sustain the Stars and Stripes of our country; and it was by their prowess that Great Britain was made to feel the force of a freeman's arm whenever wielded in a holy cause. Whenever the cross of St. George went down before the Stars and Stripes we were indebted mainly to them for that victory. We shall be faithless to the trust that has been reposed in us if we do not sustain and stand by what are their legal, their international, and their treaty rights. Stand by them, as they have always stood by their country. They ask no more.—Hon. Hannibal Hamlin (Maine), August 5.

We did not get the right to fish on the ocean from England or any other earthly power. We got it from Almighty God, and we mean to hold on to it through the whole extent of the great deep, now in the days of our strength, as our fathers held on to it in the days of our weakness. * * * I desire no war with England. Far from us and them—from the world, indeed—far be such a calamity. But, sir, the way to avoid war is to stand up firmly and temperately for our clear rights. Submission never yet brought safety, and never will. To yield when clearly right is to abandon at once our interests and our honor, and to show the world how the finger of scorn can be best pointed at us.—Hon. Lewis Cass (Michigan), August 3.

There is that with nations whose fortune it is to have thriven and prospered under the assumption and exercise of rights which are not theirs, that they grow infatuated with their too-easily earned successes and become rash and daring and reckless in the extravagant conceit that whatever they wish to attain it is in their power to grasp, and that whatever they grasp is legitimately theirs. Such is England. She knows where lies the secret in the fountain of your power. She loathes to see those naval nurseries of yours, those hives of busy seamen pitched upon the waters of what she would have you call her seas, her gulfs, her bays, as so many advanced posts, watching over the deep. She can not but look with extreme jealousy and concern on the growing prosperity of this country, and think it were well for her if she could bar its progress while it has not yet reached its acme. * * *

Sir, what does England mean? What is she after? But, hush! She is negotiating. * * * She is negotiating. * * * To negotiate under such circumstances were to sink in the dust what of pride, what of dignity, what of honor, we have grown to since we became a nation. * * * Until England has withdrawn her squadron, and gives satisfaction for what wrongs she may have perpetrated, let no negotiation be entertained, and if contrary to my expectation any has been entertained, let it be dropped at once and abandoned.—Hon. Pierre Soulé (Louisiana), August 12.

No patriots responded more readily to their country's call than the fishermen of New England. Who were the seamen in the two wars that guarded our coasts and captured the gallant ships of the British navy? They were mostly the fishermen of our country. Where were they educated for their duties? In the free schools of New England, on the banks of Newfoundland, and in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Whence could these seamen have been supplied had not Congress, in its wisdom, encouraged the fishing industry?

In the small town of Marblehead alone "at the close of the Revolution there were more than thirteen hundred widows and fatherless children" who had been so rendered by deeds of war. At the close of the war of 1812 it is said that more than five hundred citizens of this town were released from one British prison. A celebrated fisherman of the State of Maine, Skipper Tucker, as he was called, captured more guns during the Revolutionary war than any naval commander in the service.

This, sir, is the class of men for whom I speak and whose industry I ask the Government to protect.—Hon. Enoch Scudder (New Hampshire), August 12.

At this time the public of Canada were excited, and finally we came to the reciprocity treaty of 1854, a reciprocity treaty which I heard the honorable Senator from Alabama say that he regretted, as I understood him, was not in force now, a treaty that gave to the Canadian Government 94 per cent, of the advantage of the whole transaction as against 42 per cent. for us—94 per cent. on import duties was their advantage as against 42 per cent. for us. Subsequently that treaty was abandoned, and then came the treaty of 1871.

The treaty of 1871 is so familiar to everybody in the country that I shall not detain the Senate with any extended remarks upon it. Suffice it to say that we found that we had done just what the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] said as a member of the House a short time ago before he came into this body we always did. He said we had never made a treaty with Great Britain that we did not get the worst of it, although I have no doubt he will vote for this treaty. We found we had the worst of the treaty of 1871, and we found that we were ultimately compelled to pay at the rate of $500,000 a year for a privilege which, if the proof showed anything, it showed was of very little, if any, value at all. Then we abrogated that treaty. We abrogated it as soon as we could. We abrogated it by the course provided for in the treaty. In 1883 Congress passed a resolution in favor of its abrogation that took effect on the 1st of July, 1885.

When this Administration came into power it came in with this question clear, as far as they were concerned without vexation. Congress had said that the treaty of 1871 should be abrogated, and notice had been given, and the 1st of July following the treaty was to be at an end, or at least such portions of it as related to the fisheries.

There had been no demand made by anybody after the treaty of 1871 had been abrogated, by the men interested in fisheries, by the merchants upon that coast or anywhere; nobody had suggested that we had made a mistake, and nobody seemed to be anxious for the continuation of the old relations except the Canadians themselves. Seven years before that time, in 1878, we had attempted to retire from it and they had declined to allow us to do so; but nobody in 1885 wanted a continuation of the treaty of 1871 save and except the Canadian Government and the British Government because the Canadians did.

So when this Administration came into power they came in untrammelled. There was no treaty; there was nothing to disturb them. All they had to do was to do what their predecessors had done, insist upon the same construction of the treaty of 1818 that we had always contended for.

I do not forget that while the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] was serving the people in the capacity of Secretary of State a difficulty arose with reference to this question, and I have not forgotten and I think the country has not forgotten with what masterly skill he handled the question, and how he brought the Canadians and the British power to acknowledge the correctness of his position in accordance and in line with that of his illustrious predecessors, and how he secured from the British Government a large payment of money to indemnify the fishermen for losses they had sustained under an improper construction of the treaty.

I know that the Senator from Alabama said that there had been no redress furnished, that these outrages had been going on. Why, Mr. President, the outrages were stopped when it was found that there was a determination that they should stop, and the British not only quit, but they paid for the damages they had caused.

Now, sir, what is our complaint against the Canadian and the British Governments? I would not venture myself to formulate it, but in the correspondence between our minister, Mr. Phelps, and the British authorities I find an admirable statement of our complaint, which I desire to read to the Senate. In writing to the Marquis of Salisbury on the 26th day of July, 1887, Mr. Phelps, among other things, said:

But what the United States Government complain of in these cases is that existing regulations have been construed with a technical strictness, and enforced with a severity, in cases of inadvertent and accidental violation where no harm was done, which is both unusual and unnecessary, whereby the voyages of vessels have been broken up and heavy penalties incurred. That the liberal and reasonable construction of these laws that had prevailed for many years, and to which the fishermen had become accustomed, was changed without any notice given. And that every opportunity of unnecessary interference with the American fishing vessels, to the prejudice and destruction of their business, has been availed of.

That is the gist of the complaints as made by our minister to England. I will present some other portions of this letter which bear on the same subject, and also an extract from his letter of June 2, 1886, as not only showing what we complain of, but the purpose for which these outrages are committed.

[Complaint of Mr. Phelps to the Marquis of Salisbury, July 26, 1887.]

Whether, in any of these cases, a technical violation of some requirement of law had, upon close and severe construction, taken place, it is not easy to determine. But if such rules were generally enforced in such a manner in the ports of the world, no vessel could sail in safety without carrying a solicitor versed in the intricacies of revenue and port regulations.

It is unnecessary to specify the various cases referred to, as the facts in many of them have been already laid before Her Majesty's Government.

Since the receipt of Lord Iddesleigh's note the United States Government has learned with grave regret that Her Majesty's assent has been given to the act of the Parliament of Canada, passed at its late session, entitled "An act further to amend the act respecting fishing by foreign vessels," which has been the subject of observation in the previous correspondence on the subject between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain.

By the provisions of this act any foreign ship, vessel, or boat (whether engaged in fishing or not) found within any harbor in Canada, or within 3 marine miles of "any of the coasts, bays, or creeks of Canada," may be brought into port by any of the officers or persons mentioned in the act, her cargo searched, and her master examined upon oath touching the cargo and voyage under a heavy penalty if the questions asked are not truly answered; and if such ship has entered such waters "for any purpose not permitted by treaty or convention, or by law of the United Kingdom or of Canada, for the time being in force, such ship, vessel, or boat, and the tackle, rigging, apparel, furniture, stores, and cargo thereof shall be forfeited."

It has been pointed out in my note to Lord Iddesleigh, above mentioned, that the 3-mile limit referred to in this act is claimed by the Canadian Government to include considerable portions of the high seas, such as the Bay of Fundy, the Bay of Chaleur, and similar waters, by drawing the line from headland to headland, and that American fishermen had been excluded from those waters accordingly.

It has been seen also that the term "any purpose not permitted by treaty" is held by that Government to comprehend every possible act of human intercourse, except only the four purposes named in the treaty—shelter, repairs, wood, and water.

Under the provisions of the recent act, therefore, and the Canadian interpretation of the treaty, any American fishing vessel that may venture into a Canadian harbor, or may have occasion to pass through the very extensive waters thus comprehended, may be seized at the discretion of any one of numerous subordinate officers, carried into port, subjected to search and the examination of her master upon oath, her voyage broken up, and the vessel and cargo confiscated, if it shall be determined by the local authorities that she has ever even posted or received a letter or landed a passenger in any part of Her Majesty's dominions in America.

And it is publicly announced in Canada that a larger fleet of cruisers is being prepared by the authorities and that greater vigilance will be exerted on their part in the next fishing season than in the last.

It is in the act to which the one above referred to is an amendment that is found the provision to which I drew attention in a note to Lord Iddesleigh of December 2, 1886, by which it is enacted that in case a dispute arises as to whether any seizure has or has not been legally made, the burden of proving the illegality of the seizure shall be upon the owner or claimant.

In his reply to that note of January 11, 1887, his lordship intimates that this provision is intended only to impose upon a person claiming a license the burden of proving it. But a reference to the act shows that such is by no means the restriction of the enactment. It refers in the broadest and clearest terms to any seizure that is made under the provisions of the act, which covers the whole subject of protection against illegal fishing; and it applies not only to the proof of a license to fish, but to all questions of fact whatever, necessary to a determination as to the legality of a seizure or the authority of the person making it.

[Complaint of Mr. Phelps to Lord Rosebery, June 2, 1886.]

Recurring, then, to the only real question in the case, whether the vessel is to be forfeited for purchasing bait of an inhabitant of Nova Scotia, to be used in lawful fishing, it may be readily admitted that if the language of the treaty of 1818 is to be interpreted literally, rather than according to its spirit and plain intent, a vessel engaged in fishing would be prohibited from entering a Canadian port "for any purpose whatever" except to obtain wood or water, to repair damages, or to seek shelter. Whether it would be liable to the extreme penalty of confiscation for a breach of this prohibition in a trifling and harmless instance might be quite another question.

Such a literal construction is best refuted by considering its preposterous consequences. If a vessel enters a port to post a letter, or send a telegram, or buy a newspaper, to obtain a physician in case of illness, or a surgeon in case of accident, to land or bring off a passenger, or even to lend assistance to the inhabitants in fire, flood, or pestilence, it would, upon this construction, be held to violate the treaty stipulations maintained between two enlightened maritime and most friendly nations, whose ports are freely open to each other in all other places and under all other circumstances. If a vessel is not engaged in fishing she may enter all ports; but if employed in fishing, not denied to be lawful, she is excluded, though on the most innocent errand. She may buy water, but not food or medicine; wood, but not coal. She may repair rigging, but not purchase a new rope, though the inhabitants are desirous to sell it. If she even entered the port (having no other business) to report herself to the custom-house, as the vessel in question is now seized for not doing, she would be equally within the interdiction of the treaty. If it be said these are extreme instances of violation of the treaty not likely to be insisted on, I reply that no one of them is more extreme than the one relied upon in this case.

Mr. President, the question comes, What are the Canadians after? Why have they boarded within two years more than two thousand American fishing vessels? Why have they gone upon American vessels in number more than two thousand, charging them with violation of either international law, or the treaty, or local law? For what purpose? It has been asserted here, and it is not denied, that it was for the purpose of compelling us to accept a reciprocity treaty from them, as they did get one from us in 1854 and 1871. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] asserted that; the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] admitted it; but we have authority equally good. The Democratic Administration has asserted it and declared that that was the purpose. Mr. Bayard, in a letter to Mr. Phelps, of February 8, 1887, amongst other things, said:

At page 15 of the printed inclosure and in the last paragraph will be found the explicit avowal of claim by the Canadian Government to employ the convention of 1818 as an instrument of interference with the exercise of open-sea fishing by citizens of the United States, and to give it such a construction as will enable the fishermen of the provinces better to compete at less "disadvantage in the markets of the United States" in the pursuit of the deep-sea fisheries.

At the outset of this discussion, in my note to Sir Lionel West, of May 10, 1886, I said:

"The question, therefore, arises whether such a construction is admissible as would convert the treaty of 1818 from being an instrumentality for the protection of the inshore fisheries along the described parts of the British American coasts into a pretext or means of obstructing the business of deep-sea fishing by citizens of the United States, and of interrupting and destroying the commercial intercourse that since the treaty of 1818, and independent of any treaty whatever, has grown up and now exists under the concurrent and friendly laws and mercantile regulations of the respective countries."

When I wrote this I hardly expected that the motives I suggested, rather than imputed, would be admitted by the authorities of the provinces, and was entirely unprepared for a distinct avowal thereof, not only as regards the obstruction of deep-sea fishing operations by our fishermen, but also in respect of their independent commercial intercourse, yet it will be seen that the Canadian minister of justice avers that it is "most prejudicial" to the interests of the provinces "that United States fishermen should be permitted to come into their harbors on any pretext."

The correspondence now sent to you, together with others relating to the same subject that has taken place since the President's message of December 8, communicating the same to Congress, will be laid before Congress without delay, and will assist the two Houses materially in the legislation proposed for the security of the rights of American fishing vessels under treaty and international law and comity.

I am, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD

Mr. Phelps, the American minister, in a letter to Lord Rosebery of June 2, 1886, which will be found in Senate Executive Document No. 113, page 415, amongst other things, said:

The real source of the difficulty that has arisen is well understood. It is to be found in the irritation that has taken place among a portion of the Canadian people on account of the termination by the United States Government of the treaty of Washington on the 1st of July last, whereby fish imported from Canada into the United States, and which so long as that treaty remained in force was admitted free, is now liable to the import duty provided by the general revenue laws, and the opinion appears to have gained ground in Canada that the United States may be driven, by harassing and annoying their fishermen, into the adoption of a new treaty by which Canadian fish shall be admitted free.

He adds:

It is not necessary to say that this scheme is likely to prove as mistaken in policy as it is indefensible in principle. In terminating the treaty of Washington the United States were simply exercising a right expressly reserved to both parties by the treaty itself, and of the exercise of which by either party neither can complain. They will not be coerced by wanton injury into the making of a new one, nor would a negotiation that had its origin in mutual irritation be promising of success. The question now is, not what fresh treaty may or might be desirable, but what is the true and just construction as between the two nations of the treaty that already exists.

That was the sentiment of the American Senate as expressed in the Frye resolution, and which found advocacy on the other side of the Chamber, notably by the Senator from Alabama, who declared over and over again in his speech, as I propose to quote before I quit, that we needed no new treaty; that all we needed and all we wanted was a proper construction of the treaty of 1818, which he declared was not difficult to make; and he went further and said, as I will show, that if it was left to him to add to it, he knew nothing that he could add that would make it more certain.

Again, on page 36 of the same document, Mr. Phelps to the Marquis of Salisbury, in his letter of January 26, 1887, said:

The United States Government is not able to concur in the favorable view taken by Lord Iddesleigh of the efforts of the Canadian Government "to promote a friendly negotiation." That the conduct of that Government has been directed to obtaining a revision of the existing treaty is not to be doubted; but its efforts have been of such a character as to preclude the prospect of a successful negotiation so long as they continue, and seriously to endanger the friendly relations between the United States and Great Britain.

Aside from the question as to the right of American vessels to purchase bait in Canadian ports, such a construction has been given to the treaty between the United States and Great Britain as amounts virtually to a declaration of almost complete non-intercourse with American vessels. The usual comity between friendly nations has been refused in their case, and in one instance, at least, the ordinary offices of humanity. The treaty of friendship and amity which, in return for very important concessions by the United States to Great Britain, reserved to the American vessels certain specified privileges has been construed to exclude them from all other intercourse common to civilized life and to universal maritime usage among nations not at war, as well as from the right to touch and trade accorded to all other vessels.

And quite aside from any question arising upon construction of the treaty, the provisions of the custom-house acts and regulations have been systematically enforced against American ships for alleged petty and technical violations of legal requirements in a manner so unreasonable, unfriendly, and unjust as to render the privileges accorded by the treaty practically nugatory.

* * * * * * *

It has been seen also that the term "any purpose not permitted by treaty" is held by that Government to comprehend every possible act of human intercourse, except only the four purposes named in the treaty—shelter, repairs, wood, and water.

Under the provisions of the recent act, therefore, and the Canadian interpretation of the treaty, any American fishing vessel that may venture into a Canadian harbor, or may have occasion to pass through the very extensive waters thus comprehended, may be seized at the discretion of any one of numerous subordinate officers, carried into port, subjected to search and the examination of her master upon oath, her voyage broken up, and the vessel and cargo confiscated, if it shall be determined by the local authorities that she has ever even posted or received a letter or landed a passenger in any part of Her Majesty's dominions in America.

In a letter of Mr. Phelps to Earl Iddesleigh, September 11, 1886, page 433, our minister said:

The conduct of the provincial officers toward these vessels was therefore not merely unfriendly and injurious, but in clear and plain violation of the terms of the treaty. And I am instructed to say that reparation for the losses sustained by it to the owners of the vessels will be claimed by the United States Government on their behalf as soon as the amount can be accurately ascertained.

It will be observed that interference with American fishing vessels by Canadian authorities is becoming more and more frequent, and more and more flagrant in its disregard of treaty obligations and of the principles of comity and friendly intercourse. The forbearance and moderation of the United States Government in respect to them appear to have been misunderstood and to have been taken advantage of by the provincial government. The course of the United States has been dictated, not only by an anxious desire to preserve friendly relations, but by the full confidence that the interposition of Her Majesty's Government would be such as to put a stop to the transactions complained of, and to afford reparation for what has already taken place. The subject has become one of grave importance, and I earnestly solicit the immediate attention of your lordship to the question it involves, and to the views presented in my former note and in those of the Secretary of State.

Again on June 2, 1886, in a letter to Lord Rosebery, Mr. Phelps used this language, on page 419 of the document to which I have already referred:

From all the circumstances attending this case, and other recent cases like it, it seems to me very apparent that the seizure was not made for the purpose of enforcing any right or redressing any wrong. As I have before remarked, it is not pretended that the vessel had been engaged in fishing, or was intending to fish in the prohibited waters, or that it had done or was intending to do any other injurious act. It was proceeding upon its regular and lawful business of fishing in the deep sea. It had received no request, and of course could have disregarded no request, to depart, and was, in fact, departing when seized; nor had its master refused to answer any questions put by the authorities. It had violated no existing law, and had incurred no penalty that any known statute imposed.

It seems to me impossible to escape the conclusion that this and other similar seizures were made by the Canadian authorities for the deliberate purpose of harassing and embarrassing the American fishing vessels in the pursuit of their lawful employment. And the injury, which would have been a serious one, if committed under a mistake, is very much aggravated by the motives which appear to have prompted it.

I am instructed by my Government earnestly to protest against these proceedings as wholly unwarranted by the treaty of 1818, and altogether inconsistent with the friendly relations hitherto existing between the United States and Her Majesty's Government; to request that the David J. Adams, and the other American fishing vessels now under seizure in Canadian ports, be immediately released, and that proper orders may be issued to prevent similar proceedings in the future. And I am also instructed to inform you that the United States will hold Her Majesty's Government responsible for all losses which may be sustained by American citizens in the dispossession of their property growing out of the search, seizure, detention, or sale of their vessels lawfully within the territorial waters of British North America.

The real source of the difficulty that has arisen is well understood. It is to be found in the irritation that has taken place among a portion of the Canadian people on account of the termination by the United States Government of the treaty of Washington on the 1st of July last, whereby fish imported from Canada into the United States, and which so long as that treaty was in force was admitted free, is now liable to the import duty provided by the general revenue laws, and the opinion appears to have gained ground in Canada that the United States may be driven, by harassing and annoying their fishermen, into the adoption of a new treaty by which Canadian fish shall be admitted free.

It is not necessary to say that this scheme is likely to prove as mistaken in policy as it is indefensible in principle. In terminating the treaty of Washington the United States were simply exercising a right expressly reserved to both parties by the treaty itself, and of the exercise of which by either party neither can complain. They will not be coerced by wanton injury into the making of a new one. Nor would a negotiation that had its origin in mutual irritation be promising of success. The question now is, not what fresh treaty may or might be desirable, but what is the true and just construction, as between the two nations, of the treaty that already exists?

The Government of the United States, approaching this question in the most friendly spirit, can not doubt that it will be met by Her Majesty's Government in the same spirit, and feels every confidence that the action of Her Majesty's Government in the premises will be such as to maintain the cordial relations between the two countries that have so long happily prevailed.

I have the honor to be, etc.,

E. J. PHELPS.

Mr. President, it can not be denied in regard to these outrages perpetrated upon the American fishermen, by which they have been seized and taken into British ports and outraged generally—conduct of which the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Manning, in a letter that he addressed the House of Representatives in 1886, declared over his official signature was brutal; that has been characterized by the Secretary of State and by our minister to London to the very extreme of diplomatic language as being in violation of treaty, contrary to good morals, and an indignity to this great and independent people—it can not be denied (because you have the authority of the Administration as well as the consensus of all that have been interested and have studied and discussed the question) that this movement is not for the purpose of enforcing the treaty stipulations of 1818, but to compel us to make a treaty, whether we will or not, that they think is in the interest of Canada and the British dominion on our north.

Can we afford under such circumstances to negotiate? Could we afford to call a commission to our national capital to consider subjects of dispute when the Secretary of State himself is on record and his minister is on record that these are outrages perpetrated for the purpose of creating a necessity in the minds of the American people for a new treaty? Was not Mr. Phelps right when he said we do not want any new treaty under existing circumstances? Was he not correct when he said it is not now a question what kind of treaty is desirable provided we were in a condition to treat, but what is the proper construction of the treaty of 1818?

But, Mr. President, I say, and believe the American people will say with one voice when they understand this question, that it was beneath the dignity of the United States to enter into negotiation until at least the other side should have ceased to commit these grievances against us. We should not complain of an honest construction, although wrong, but when the Secretary of State tells them and his minister tells them that they know that this is but a pretense on their part; that there is not any such construction in their view of the law; that these are not proceedings instigated by a desire to protect their rights, but to inflict injuries upon us to compel us to pursue a course that they think will inure to their benefit, I say that we can not and ought not to have treated, and so said the Administration. Mr. Phelps, in a letter to Lord Iddesleigh on September 11, 1886, says, on page 433:

The proposal in your lordship's note that a revision of the treaty stipulations bearing upon the subject of the fisheries should be attempted by the Government upon the basis of mutual concessions is one that under other circumstances would merit and receive serious consideration. Such a revision was desired by the Government of the United States before the present disputes arose, and when there was a reasonable prospect that it might have been carried into effect. Various reasons not within its control now concur to make the present time inopportune for that purpose, and greatly to diminish the hope of a favorable result to such an effort. Not the least of them is the irritation produced in the United States by the course of the Canadian Government, and the belief thereby engendered that a new treaty is attempted to be forced upon the United States Government.

It seems apparent that the questions now presented and the transactions that are the subject of present complaint must be considered and adjusted upon the provisions of the existing treaty, and upon the construction that is to be given to them.

A just construction of these stipulations, and such as would consist with the dignity, the interests, and the friendly relations of the two countries, ought not to be difficult, and can doubtless be arrived at.

Later, on January 26, 1887, page 437, speaking of this same subject, whether the Government of the United States could now treat, he said:

The reasons why a revision of the treaty of 1818 can not now, in the opinion of the United States Government, be hopefully undertaken, and which are set forth in my note to Lord Iddesleigh of September 11, have increased in force since that note was written.

Thus, Mr. President, we have the authority of the Administration itself, that until redress for these outrages had been in some way obtained by us, or they had been overlooked or forgiven at the request of the people who committed them, we ought not to have any treaty at all.

I must retrace my steps a little, and come back to the condition of affairs when the Administration came into power.

As I said before, this Administration was met by an expiring treaty on July 1, 1885. Eight days after this Administration came into power the British minister addressed a most remarkable note to the Secretary of State.

Congress had declared that the treaty of 1871 should come to an end; there had been practical unanimity everywhere on the subject; and yet the British minister on the 12th day of March, 1885, eight days after the Administration came into power, makes a suggestion to the Administration substantially that Congress did not know what it wanted, that the great Government of the United States represented in its legislative department was not capable of determining these questions as they ought to be, and that the State Department and he might be able to work out something that would be better. Can anybody believe, does anybody believe that this letter which I shall read could ever have been submitted by Mr. West of his own volition? Would there have been that temerity on the part of any representative from abroad to have said to an executive officer of the United States, "Your Government has made a mistake in a matter of internal policy," with which he had no concern? I think it may be fairly presumed that he got his idea from the Administration, that they were prepared to negotiate upon this subject with a view to a change of status. He said—I read from page 484 of the same document:

1.—Mr. West's memorandum of March 12, 1885.

[Memorandum.—Confidential.]

The fishery clauses of the treaty of Washington of 1871 will expire on the 1st of July next. It has been represented by the Canadian Government that much inconvenience is likely to arise in consequence, unless some agreement can be made for an extension of the period.

When the time comes (1st of July next) American ships will be actually engaged in fishing within the territorial waters of the Dominion. These vessels will have been fitted out for the season's fishing and have made all their usual arrangements for following it up until its termination in the autumn. If, under these circumstances, the provincial or municipal authorities in Canada were to insist upon their strict rights, and to compel such vessels, under pain of seizure, to desist from fishing, considerable hardship would be occasioned to the owners, and a feeling of bitterness engendered on both sides, which it is clearly the interest of both Governments to avert.

It seems, therefore, desirable, in order to avoid such possible complications, that both Governments should come to an agreement under which the clauses might be in effect extended until the 1st of January, 1886.

If this were done the existing state of things would come to an end at a date between the fishery season of 1885 and that of 1886, and an abrupt transition at a moment when fishery operations were being carried on would be thus avoided.

WASHINGTON, March 12, 1885.

The solicitude of the Canadian Government for our fishermen was hardly in keeping with their subsequent conduct, hardly in keeping with their conduct years ago, and it can not be misunderstood that this negotiation was commenced and carried on for an entirely different purpose, as I shall show in a moment as briefly as I can, for the purpose of getting from us that which the Canadian Government had been demanding, a reciprocity treaty, and that the Administration were parties to this, and that the Secretary of State understood it. His letters show that it was not a simple question of fishing, but it was more than that.

On the 22d day of April, 1885, Mr. Bayard replied. Whether there had been any other correspondence I know not, except that it is not found in the diplomatic correspondence sent to the Senate.

2.—Mr. Bayard to Mr. West, April 22, 1885.

[Memorandum of April 22, 1885.—Personal.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, April 22, 1885.

DEAR MR. WEST: I have on several occasions lately, in conversation, acquainted you with my interest in the fisheries memorandum which accompanied your personal letter of March 12.

Several informal talks I have had with Sir Ambrose Shea have enabled me to formulate the views of this Government upon the proposition made in behalf of the Dominion and the Province of Newfoundland, and I take pleasure in handing you herewith a memorandum embodying the results. If this suits, I shall be happy to confirm the arrangement by an exchange of notes at your earliest convenience.

I am, my dear Mr. West, very sincerely yours,

T. F. BAYARD.

The Hon. L. S. SACKVILLE WEST, etc.

I do not know very much about the intricacies of diplomacy and I do not know very much about the negotiation of treaties, but it struck me as a very singular proposition that the Secretary of State, upon a subject which had engrossed the attention of all his predecessors for several years on and off, that had engrossed the attention of Congress, should have needed the views of Sir Ambrose Shea, who, I understand, is a member of the cabinet of one of the British provinces. At all events the memorandum is the result of informal talks of the Secretary with Sir Ambrose Shea. How much of it is the work of Sir Ambrose Shea and how much of it is the work of the Administration I do not know. So I am unable to give the proper credit.

I find on June 13, 1885, another memorandum:

3.—Mr. West's memoranda of June 13, 1885.

[Memoranda.]

It is proposed to state in notes according temporary arrangements respecting fisheries that an agreement has been arrived at under circumstances affording prospect of negotiation for development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America—

That is the whole question in a nut-shell—affording prospect of negotiation for development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America.

I submit that means reciprocity and does not mean anything else. This was the initiatory step towards a reciprocity treaty with Great Britain. Mr. West added:

The government of Newfoundland do not make refunding of duties a condition of their acceptance of the proposed agreement, but they rely on it having due consideration before the international commission which may be appointed.

To that Mr. Bayard replied, June 19, 1885:

[Confidential.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 19, 1885.

MY DEAR MR. WEST: I assume that the two confidential memoranda you handed to me on the 13th instant embrace the acceptance by the Dominion and the British-American coast provinces of the general features of my memorandum of April 21, concerning a temporary arrangement respecting the fisheries, with the understanding expressed on their side that the "agreement has been arrived at under circumstances affording prospect of negotiation for development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America."

To such a contingent understanding I can have no objection. Indeed, I regard it as covered by the statement in my memorandum of May 21, that the arrangement therein contemplated would be reached "with the understanding that the President of the United States would bring the whole question of the fisheries before Congress at its next session in December, and recommend the appointment of a commission in which the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain should be respectively represented, which commission should be charged with the consideration and settlement upon a just, equitable, and honorable basis, of the entire question of the fishing rights of the two Governments and their respective citizens on the coasts of the United States and British North America."

The equities of the question being before such a mixed commission would doubtless have the fullest latitude of expression and treatment on both sides; and the purpose in view being the maintenance of good neighborhood and intercourse between the two countries, the recommendation of any measures which the commission might deem necessary to attain those ends would seem to fall within its province, and such recommendations could not fail to receive attentive consideration. I am not, therefore, prepared to state limits to the proposals to be brought forward in the suggested commission on behalf of either party.

I believe this statement will be satisfactory to you, and I should be pleased to be informed at the earliest day practicable of your acceptance of the understanding on behalf of British North America; and by this simple exchange of notes and memoranda the agreement will be completed in season to enable the President to make the result publicly known to the citizens engaged in the fishing on the British-American Atlantic coast.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.

That was not entirely satisfactory to Mr. West, and he replied on the 20th:

Mr. West to Mr. Bayard, June 20, 1885.

[Confidential.]

BRITISH LEGATION, Washington, June 20, 1885.

MY DEAR MR. BAYARD: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your confidential note of yesterday's date, concerning the proposed temporary arrangement respecting the fisheries, which I am authorized by Her Majesty's Government to negotiate with you on behalf of the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the government of Newfoundland, to be effected by an exchange of notes founded on your memorandum of the 21st of April last.

The two confidential memoranda which I handed to you on the 13th instant contain, as you assume, the acceptance by the Dominion and the British-American coast provinces of the general features of your above-mentioned memorandum, with the understanding expressed on their side that the agreement has been arrived at under circumstances affording prospects of negotiation for the development and extension of trade between the United States and British North America, a contingent understanding to which, as you state, you can have no objection, as you regard it as covered by the terms of your memorandum of April 21.

In authorizing me to negotiate this agreement, Earl Granville states, as I have already had occasion to intimate to you, that it is on the distinct understanding that it is a temporary one, and that its conclusion must not be held to prejudice any claim which may be advanced to more satisfactory equivalents by the colonial governments in the course of the negotiation for a more permanent settlement. Earl Granville further wishes me to tell you that Her Majesty's Government and the colonial governments have consented to the arrangement solely as a mark of good-will to the Government and people of the United States—

A remarkable exhibition of good-will to the people of the United States to give them that which they had declared without dissent, through the only organ through which they could properly declare it, that they did not want it continued—and to avoid difficulties which might be raised by the termination of the fishery articles in the midst of a fishing season; and also the acceptance of such a modus vivendi does not, by any implication, affect the value of the inshore fisheries by the Governments of Canada and Newfoundland. I had occasion to remark to you that while the colonial governments are asked to guaranty immunity from interference to American vessels resorting to Canadian waters, no such immunity is offered in your memorandum to Canadian vessels resorting to American waters, but that the Dominion government presumed that the agreement in this respect would be mutual. As you accepted this view, it would, I think, be as well that mention should be made to this effect in the notes.

Under the reservations, as above indicated, in which I believe you acquiesce, I am prepared to accept the understanding on behalf of British North America, and to exchange notes in the above sense.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.

Hon. T. E. BAYARD, etc.

So, Mr. President, I think it may be assumed that the initiative of this proposed treaty was not for the purpose of making a treaty on the fishery question, but a reciprocity treaty. The President of the United States, agreeable to his agreement with the British Government, submitted a proposition to Congress for the appointment of a commission. I need not go into that at any great length, except to show the action of certain members of the Senate of the United States upon that proposition. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] offered this resolution:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the appointment of a commission in which the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be represented, charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the two Governments, on the coasts of the United States and British North America, ought not to be provided for by Congress.

When that resolution was before the Senate the Committee on Foreign Relations were represented not in a partisan way at all. The Senator from Maine made some remarks, which were followed by the Senator from Alabama, a member, and I may say the leading member of the committee upon the Democratic side. Mr. MORGAN said:

In listening to the remarks of the Senator from Maine, and also in what investigation I have been able to give this subject, I am unable to ascertain that there is really any unsettled question between the United States and Great Britain in regard to the fisheries of the northeastern coast. I have inquired of Senators who have had long experience in diplomatic affairs of the country, to ascertain, if I could, whether there was any open question of damages, any claim of damages arising between the Governments respectively out of any supposed breach of our fisheries treaties or our fisheries laws; and I can hear nothing of that kind. The Halifax Commission seems to have settled for good and all every controversy, sounding in damages at least, which has been promoted or urged by the citizens of the countries on either side.

I conceive that there is no want of certainty in our treaty relations, and there is scarcely room for a difference in interpretation of what our treaty relations actually are. The two treaties which have settled the actual and what we might term the permanent rights of the people of the United States and of the Dominion country in regard to the fisheries are the treaties of 1783 and 1818. No other treaties we have made at all in respect to the fisheries have undertaken to define the permanent enduring rights either of the British people or of our people in respect of the fisheries. We have had two other treaties on this subject, the treaty of 1854 and the treaty of 1871, but they were both temporary in their character and both made liable to be suspended by the action of either government after they had run for ten years, and both have been abrogated. So that the field is entirely clear in respect of the actual state of treaty relations between the United States and Great Britain, and those treaty relations rest upon the treaties of 1783 and 1818.

He then discussed the question whether the treaty of 1783 had been superseded by the treaty of 1818, and he differed from the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] and some others, and asserted that it had not been. He quoted the treaty of 1783, and declared:

That was all that was said about it. A broader right of fishery than that can not be conceived of; no restriction or restraint upon it at all, except that in conducting their business they should not trespass or intrude on private property on the shore in drawing their fish or mending their nets or whatever other use they might have for the shore.

He went on to say in substance that it was an entire perversion of the treaty of 1818 to give it the construction that the British or Canadian authorities were contending for. Then he said, speaking of the British statute:

If that is so, it seems to me there is no difficulty at all either in construing or in handling this matter. As I remarked before, I can not see that there is any difficulty in the construction of the treaty of 1818 taken by itself. All the rights that are guarantied there and that have not been enlarged by statute of Great Britain obtain, and there is no difficulty in the construction of them. There is no difficulty in the construction of the British statutes on this subject. But, then, we are not called upon to construe them. What we are called upon to do is to protect our people against any wrong construction that they may put upon their own laws, by a power that we reserve expressly in the hands of the President of the United States.

I do not wish to volunteer any opinions about this subject before a question gets before the Senate and I am compelled to act upon it; but my convictions are very strong; they are fixed; indeed I may say that we can get along with the people of Great Britain on this subject without any further treaty at all and without any further legislation. If any one were to ask me what provision of a treaty I would frame to compose and settle any question of fundamental law between us and Great Britain in respect of the fisheries, I could not suggest it, or if I were asked to propose an amendment to the statutes of the United States so as to put the control of this intricate subject more completely in the hands of our own Government I could not frame the amendment to the statutes. I would not know how to do it. I believe that both the treaty stipulations and the situation under the statutes are about as complete as we are ever able to make them. There may be other interests, and there are other interests lying between the people of the British possessions and the United States that I would like very much indeed to see promoted by further negotiation, but I can not call to mind, there is no suggestion to my mind of, any improvement that we could make under existing conditions of our rights in the fisheries of that Northeastern coast.

Speaking on another point he said:

Therefore I think that the Government should leave the matter just where it is, and I do not think Congress can be persuaded to repeal that act.

That was an act which gave the President power to interfere if our ships were not properly treated.

That was the opinion of the Senator from Alabama when he declared that our commercial rights were derived from the act of Great Britain of 1830 in conjunction with our own, when he declared in unequivocal terms that the right to purchase bait and ice were guarantied to us by that commercial arrangement, and as long as Great Britain did not retire from that arrangement made between the British Government and ours by which we were to pass certain legislation and they were to have certain orders made in council, there was no question at all about our right to buy ice and bait. He went on to say that it was beneath the dignity of the Government of the United States to put in a treaty a provision that we might buy bait and ice.

This resolution, as everybody remembers, passed with practical unanimity or nearly so, there being but ten votes against it in the Senate and the Senator from Alabama being one of those who voted for it.

However, Mr. President, these violations of our treaty rights continued and it was thought best to arm the Government of the United States with more extended powers than the acts already on the statute-book gave. A bill was introduced, if I recollect aright, by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator from Alabama, as I have before said, is a member, and when the bill came before the Senate the Senator from Alabama said:

Mr. President, I was a member of the committee who reported this bill, and it received my cordial approbation. I was also a member of the subcommittee which formulated the bill, and it was carefully considered there in connection with the evidence which had been collected not only from their own investigations under the order of the Senate but also from the archives of the State Department as far as we had access to those archives.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to this statement made by the Senator from Alabama that he was one of the originators of this act that armed the President with power to suspend Canadian commerce if he saw fit.

I call the attention of the Senate to that because I propose to notice his complaint made in the Senate that we had acted cowardly in this matter; that we were not willing to take the responsibility of determining whether there were violations of the treaty of 1818, and were not willing ourselves to declare non-intercourse, either limited or to an extended degree, but that we had imposed this upon the President, as he said, for the purpose of getting the President into difficulty, or words to that effect. Yet he announced to the Senate that he was one of the originators of it, and that it had his unqualified support; and he defended it in a lengthy speech, I need not say in an able speech. He took the American side of the question, and when the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] attempted to amend the statute of March 3, 1887, by giving it more force, as he said, and extending it further, the Senator from Alabama was again heard. On all occasions it received his unqualified approbation as it received the unqualified approbation of every member of the Democratic party in the Senate. No man on that side either lifted his voice against the bill or voted against it; and yet we are told now that the statute was enacted for the purpose of getting the Democratic Administration into difficulty.

When the bill went to the House of Representatives it was ably discussed, as the RECORD will show. Not wishing to detain the Senate, I shall not advert to each particular statement made by the members of the House. I presume Senators have looked up that debate. There was no objection to the bill. There was a controversy between the House and the Senate as to which particular bill should be adopted, whether it should be the bill of the Senate or the bill of the House. It was contended in the House that the House bill was the most vigorous, that it put more power in the hands of the Administration, and therefore they favored it. In the House at that time there was the present Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], who made an able speech in defense of the American idea of the treaty of 1818; there was the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], who declared that we ought to be careful how we dealt with Great Britain, for in all our dealings with Great Britain we had been always overreached; there were Mr. CLEMENTS, Mr. COX, and other distinguished Democrats, all of them, including Mr. MILLS, supporting the measure, not simply by their votes, but by their speeches, every one of them insisting then that the American construction of the treaty of 1818 was the construction we should insist upon at all times. That bill passed the Senate with one dissenting vote, and he was not a Democrat.

Mr. FRYE. That was a vote cast by mistake.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Maine says that was a vote cast by mistake. The bill passed the House with one dissenting vote, and I do not know whose vote that was.

I desire to submit several letters of the Secretary of State for the purpose of showing that when we complain and say that the conduct of the Canadian officials has been in violation of the treaty we are supported by the Secretary of State. I find that in a letter to Mr. West, written May 10, 1886, he declares that the British construction of the treaty, if allowed, would be in effect to utterly destroy all our rights under the treaty of 1818. He was insisting in the letter as to our commercial rights that they had been enlarged by the action of Congress, the proclamation of the President and the action of the British Government in 1830, and that they included fishing vessels as well as othe vessels. He said, on page 290:

President Jackson's proclamation of October 5, 1830, created a reciprocal commercial intercourse, on terms of perfect equality of flag, between this country and the British American dependencies, by repealing the navigation acts of April 18, 1818, May 15, 1820, and March 1, 1823, and admitting British vessels and their cargoes "to an entry in the ports of the United States from the islands, provinces, and colonies of Great Britain on or near the American continent, and north or east of the United States." These commercial privileges have since received a large extension in the interests of propinquity, and in some cases favors have been granted by the United States without equivalent concession. Of the latter class is the exemption granted by the shipping act of June 26, 1884, amounting to one-half of the regular tonnage dues on all vessels from the British North American and West Indian possessions entering ports of the United States. Of the reciprocal class are the arrangements for transit of goods, and the remission, by proclamation, as to certain British ports and places of the remainder of the tonnage-tax, on evidence of equal treatment being shown to our vessels.

On the other side, British and colonial legislation, as notably in the case of the imperial shipping and navigation act of June 26, 1849, has contributed its share toward building up an intimate intercourse and beneficial traffic between the two countries founded on mutual interest and convenience.

Again he said, on page 291:

The effect of this colonial legislation and Executive interpretation, if executed according to the letter, would be not only to expand the restrictions and renunciations of the treaty of 1818, which related solely to inshore fishery within the 3-mile limit, so as to affect the deep-sea fisheries, the right to which remained unquestioned and unimpaired for the enjoyment of the citizens of the United States, but further to diminish and practically to destroy the privileges expressly secured to American fishing vessels to visit those inshore waters for the objects of shelter, repair of damages, and purchasing wood and obtaining water.

Again he said, on page 292:

I may recall to your attention the fact that a proposition to exclude the vessels of the United States engaged in fishing from carrying also merchandise was made by the British negotiators of the treaty of 1818, but, being resisted by the American negotiators, was abandoned. This fact would seem clearly to indicate that the business of fishing did not then and does not now disqualify a vessel from also trading in the regular ports of entry.

On the 29th of May, 1886, in a letter to Mr. West, Mr. Bayard used this language, on page 297:

SIR: I have just received an official imprint of House of Commons bill No. 136, now pending in the Canadian Parliament, entitled "An act further to amend the act respecting fishing by foreign vessels," and am informed that it has passed the house and is now pending in the senate.

This bill proposes the forcible search, seizure, and forfeiture of any foreign vessel within any harbor in Canada, or hovering within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors in Canada, where such vessel has entered such waters for any purpose not permitted by the laws of nations, or by treaty or convention, or by any law of the United Kingdom or of Canada now in force.

* * * * * * *

Such proceedings I conceive to be flagrantly violative of the reciprocal commercial privileges to which citizens of the United States are lawfully entitled under statutes of Great Britain and the well-defined and publicly proclaimed authority of both countries, besides being in respect of the existing conventions between the two countries an assumption of jurisdiction entirely unwarranted and which is wholly denied by the United States.

The contention of the Department of State is now that we never had any commercial rights for our fishing vessels. What did the Secretary of State mean when he was thus addressing the British authorities as the representative of the Government of the United States? Was he in earnest? Did he believe that we had commercial rights?

It will be seen that the Secretary of State notified the citizens of the United States that their right to buy bait in the Canadian ports was unquestioned under the law; and to-day we are told by the President, by the Secretary of State, and by all his adherents on the other side of the Chamber, that it is a right we never had at all. If we assert that the right exists by virtue of the treaty, we are told that our partisan zeal to secure votes in certain quarters is so great that we can not approach this subject in the judicial temper with which they are approaching it. Again, the Secretary of State said on the 7th of June, 1886, page 298:

SIR: I regret exceedingly to communicate that report is to-day made to me, accompanied by affidavit, of the refusal of the collector of customs at the port of St. Andrews, New Brunswick, to allow the master of the American schooner Annie M. Jordan, of Gloucester, Mass., to enter the said vessel at that port, although properly documented as a fishing vessel with permission to touch and trade at any foreign port or place during her voyage.

The object of such entry was explained by the master to be the purchase and exportation of "certain merchandise" (possibly fresh fish for food, or bait for deep-sea fishing).

The vessel was threatened with seizure by the Canadian authorities, and her owners allege that they have sustained damage from this refusal of commercial rights.

I earnestly protest against this unwarranted withholding of lawful commercial privileges from an American vessel and her owners, and for the loss and damage consequent thereon the Government of Great Britain will be held liable.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

How much we shall get will be readily seen when they now meet us at all times with the declarations of the President and the Secretary of State that no such commercial privileges ever existed for our fishing vessels, and that a fishing vessel could not be a fishing vessel and a commercial vessel at the same time.

The Canadian authorities in 1886 warned off all our vessels, threatened them if they did not keep away from that coast. June 14, 1886, Mr. Bayard addressed this letter to Sir Lionel West concerning this matter:

Mr. Bayard to Sir L. West.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 14, 1886.

SIR: The consul-general of the United States at Halifax communicated to me the information derived by him from the collector of customs at that port to the effect that American fishing vessels will not be permitted to land fish at that port of entry for transportation in bond across the province.

I have also to inform you that the masters of the four American fishing vessels of Gloucester, Mass., Martha A. Bradley, Rattler, Eliza Boynton, and Pioneer, have severally reported to the consul-general at Halifax that the subcollector of customs at Canso had warned them to keep outside an imaginary line drawn from a point 3 miles outside Canso Head to a point 3 miles outside St. Esprit, on the Cape Breton coast, a distance of 40 miles. This line for nearly its entire continuance is distant 12 to 25 miles from the coast.

The same masters also report that they were warned against going inside an imaginary line drawn from a point 3 miles outside North Cape, on Prince Edward Island, to a point 3 miles outside of East Point, on the same island, a distance of over 100 miles, and that this last-named line was for nearly that entire distance about 30 miles from the shore.

The same authority informed the masters of the vessels referred to that they would not be permitted to enter Bay Chaleur.

Such warnings are, as you must be well aware, wholly unwarranted pretentions of extraterritorial authority and usurpations of jurisdiction by the provincial officials.

It becomes my duty, in bringing this information to your notice, to request that if any such orders for interference with the unquestionable rights of the American fishermen to pursue their business without molestation at any point not within 3 marine miles of the shores, and within the defined limits as to which renunciation of the liberty to fish was expressed in the treaty of 1818, may have been issued, the same may at once be revoked as violative of the rights of citizens of the United States under convention with Great Britain.

I will ask you to bring this subject to the immediate attention of Her Britannic Majesty's Government, to the end that proper remedial orders may be forthwith issued.

It seems most unfortunate and regretable that questions which have been long since settled between the United States and Great Britain should now be sought to be revived.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

Mr. President, I was not mistaken when I said he had revived the obsolete headland theory. Here is his own statement that it had been abandoned. I will show before I get through that Sir Charles Tupper declared to the Canadian Parliament that it had been abandoned, and every man familiar with the history of these transactions knows that it had been practically abandoned.

Some time in April, 1886, Messrs. Cushing and McKenney, New England men doing business in those waters, addressed a telegram to the Secretary of State seeking to know what their rights were. I have not the telegram here, but the answer is sufficient to show what it was. They asked, "Are we entitled to go in these waters, and what are our rights when we get there?" The reply of the State Department was as follows:

Mr. Bayard to Messrs. Cushing and McKenney.

[Telegram.]

STATE DEPARTMENT, April 9, 1886.

The question of the right of American vessels engaged in fishing on the high seas to enter Canadian ports for the purpose of shipping crews may possibly involve construction of treaty with Great Britain. I expect to attain such an understanding as will relieve our fishermen from all doubts or risk in the exercise of the ordinary commercial privileges of friendly ports, to which, under existing laws of both countries, I consider their citizens to be mutually entitled, free from molestation.

T. F. BAYARD.

The Secretary of State expressed his opinion that while it might be difficult to say whether we could ship crews, we could buy bait and we could buy ice and we could buy provisions if the ship was in distress or needed them. Yet to-day we are told that no such rights exist, that they never did exist, and that he who asserts it asserts it simply because he is blind and can not see.

Again, in a letter to Mr. West of May 10, 1886, Mr. Bayard complained of the seizure of vessels as follows, on page 290:

The seizure of the vessels I have mentioned, and certain published "warnings" purporting to have been issued by the colonial authorities, would appear to have been made under a supposed delegation of jurisdiction by the Imperial Government of Great Britain, and to be intended to include authority to interpret and enforce the provisions of the treaty of 1818, to which, as I have remarked, the United States and Great Britain are the contracting parties, who can alone deal responsibly with questions arising thereunder.

The effect of this colonial legislation and executive interpretation, if executed according to the letter, would be not only to expand the restrictions and renunciations of the treaty of 1818, which related solely to inshore fishery within the 3-mile limit, so as to affect the deep-sea fisheries, the right to which remained unquestioned and unimpaired for the employment of the citizens of the United States, but further to diminish and practically to destroy the privileges expressly secured to American fishing vessels to visit those inshore waters for the objects of shelter, repair of damages, and purchasing wood, and obtaining water.

July 2, 1886, Mr. Bayard complained to Mr. West in the following language:

Mr. Bayard to Sir L. West.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 2, 1886.

SIR: It is my unpleasant duty promptly to communicate to you the telegraphic report to me by the United States consul-general at Halifax, that the schooner City Point, of Portland, Me., arrived at the port of Shelburne, Nova Scotia, landed two men, obtained water, and is detained by the authorities until further instructions are received from Ottawa.

The case as thus reported is an infringement on the ordinary rights of international hospitality, and constitutes a violation of treaty stipulations and commercial privileges, evincing such unfriendliness to the citizens of the United States as is greatly to be deplored, and which I hold it to be the responsible duty of the Government of Great Britain promptly to correct.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

At a later date, July 10, 1886, Mr. Bayard recited another outrage, as follows:

Mr. Bayard to Sir L. West.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 10, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I am in receipt of a report from the consul-general of the United States at Halifax, accompanied by sworn testimony stating that the Novelty, a duly registered merchant steam-vessel of the United States, has been denied the right to take in steam-coal, or purchase ice, or transship fish in bond to the United States, at Pictou, Nova Scotia.

It appears that, having reached that port on the 1st instant and finding the customs office closed on account of a holiday, the master of the Novelty telegraphed to the minister of marine and fisheries at Ottawa, asking if he would be permitted to do any of the three things mentioned above; that he received in reply a telegram reciting with certain inaccurate and extended application the language of Article I of the treaty of 1818, the limitations upon the significance of which are in pending discussion between the Government of the United States and that of Her Britannic Majesty; that on entering and clearing the Novelty on the following day at the custom-house, the collector stated that his instructions were contained in the telegram the master had received; and that, the privilege of coaling being denied, the Novelty was compelled to leave Pictou without being allowed to obtain fuel necessary for her lawful voyage on a dangerous coast.

Against this treatment I make instant and formal protest as an unwarranted interpretation and application of the treaty by the officers of the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Nova Scotia, as an infraction of the laws of commercial and maritime intercourse existing between the two countries, and as a violation of hospitality, and for any loss or injury resulting therefrom the Government of Her Britannic Majesty will be held liable.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

On the same day, July 10, 1886, Mr. Bayard wrote to Mr. West as follows:

To-day Mr. C. A. BOUTELLE, M. C. from Maine, informs me that American boats visiting St. Andrews, New Brunswick, for the purpose of there purchasing herring from the Canadian weirs, for canning, had been driven away by the Dominion cruiser Middleton.

Such inhibition of usual and legitimate commercial contracts and intercourse is assuredly without warrant of law, and I draw your attention to it in order that the commercial rights of citizens of the United States may not be thus invaded and subjected to unfriendly discrimination.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

July 16, 1886, Mr. Bayard wrote to Mr. Hardinge as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 16, 1886.

SIR: I have just received through the honorable C. A. BOUTELLE, M. C., the affidavit of Stephen R. Balkam, alleging his expulsion from the harbor of St. Andrews, New Brunswick, by Captain Kent, of the Dominion cruiser Middleton, and the refusal to permit him to purchase fish caught and sold by Canadians, for the purpose of canning as sardines.

The action of Captain Kent seems to be a gross violation of ordinary commercial privileges against an American citizen proposing to transact his customary and lawful trade and not prepared or intending in any way to fish or violate any local law or regulation or treaty stipulation.

I trust instant instructions to prevent the recurrence of such unfriendly and unlawful treatment of American citizens may be given to the offending officials at St. Andrews, and reparation be made to Mr. Balkam.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

Again, July 30, 1886, Mr. Bayard wrote to Sir Lionel West as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, July 30, 1886.

SIR: It is my duty to draw your attention to an infraction of the stipulations of the treaty between the United States of America and Great Britain, concluded October 20, 1818.

* * * * * * *

I am also in possession of the affidavit of Alexander T. Eachern, master of the American fishing schooner Mascot, who entered Port Amherst, Magdalen Islands, and was there threatened by the customs official with seizure of his vessel if he attempted to obtain bait for fishing or to take a pilot.

These are flagrant violations of treaty rights of their citizens for which the United States expect prompt remedial action by Her Majesty's Government; and I have to ask that such instructions may be issued forthwith to the provincial officials of Newfoundland and of the Magdalen Islands as will cause the treaty rights of citizens of the United States to be duly respected.

For the losses occasioned in the two cases I have mentioned, compensation will hereafter be expected from Her Majesty's Government when the amount shall have been accurately ascertained.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

Later, August 9, 1886, there seems still to have been trouble, and Mr. Bayard addressed Mr. Hardinge, as follows:

Mr. Bayard to Mr. Hardinge.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, August 9, 1886.

SIR: I regret that it has become my duty to draw the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the unwarrantable and unfriendly treatment, reported to me this day by the United States consul-general at Halifax, experienced by the American fishing schooner Rattler, of Gloucester, Mass., on the 3d instant, upon the occasion of her being driven by stress of weather to find shelter in the harbor of Shelburne, Nova Scotia.

* * * * * * *

The vessel was then detained until the captain reported at the custom-house, after which she was permitted to sail.

The hospitality which all civilized nations prescribe has thus been violated and the stipulations of a treaty grossly infracted.

A fishing vessel, denied all the usual commercial privileges in a port, has been compelled strictly to perform commercial obligations.

In the interests of amity, I ask that this misconduct may be properly rebuked by the government of Her Majesty.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

Later, on August 17, 1886, Mr. Bayard, in a letter to Mr. West, used this language, speaking of another transaction:

I have further the honor to ask with all earnestness that the Government of Her Britannic Majesty will cause steps to be forthwith taken to prevent and rebuke acts so violative of treaty and of the common rites of hospitality.

And on the next day, August 18, 1886, Mr. Bayard, in a letter to the same gentleman, used the following language, speaking of the vessel Rattler:

Such conduct can not be defended on any just ground, and I draw your attention to it in order that Her Britannic Majesty's Government may reprimand Captain Quigley for his unwarranted and rude act.

It was simply impossible for this officer to suppose that any invasion of the fishing privileges of Canada was intended by these vessels under the circumstances.

The firing of a gun across their bows was a most unusual and wholly uncalled for exhibition of hostility, and equally so was the placing of armed men on board the peaceful and lawful craft of a friendly nation.

Speaking of the Molly Adams, in his letter of September 10, 1886, Mr. Bayard said to Mr. West:

This inhospitable, indeed inhuman, conduct on the part of the customs officer in question should be severely reprimanded, and for the infraction of treaty rights and commercial privileges compensation equivalent to the injuries sustained will be claimed from Her Majesty's Government.

Complaining of another transaction, Mr. Bayard, in a letter to Mr. West, said September 23, 1886:

Mr. Bayard to Sir L. West.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, September 23, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to bring to your attention an instance which has been brought to my knowledge of an alleged denial of one of the rights guarantied by the convention of 1818, in the case of an American vessel.

Capt. Joseph E. Graham, of the fishing schooner A. R. Crittenden, of Gloucester, Mass., states under oath that on or about the 21st of July last, on a return trip from the open-sea fishing grounds to his home port, and while passing through the Strait of Canso, he stopped at Steep Creek for water. The customs officer at that place told him that if he took in water his vessel would be seized; whereupon he sailed without obtaining the needed supply, and was obliged to put his men on short allowance of water during the passage homeward.

I have the honor to ask that Her Britannic Majesty's Government cause investigation to be made of the reported action of the customs officer at Steep Creek, and if the facts be as stated, that he be promptly rebuked for his unlawful and inhumane conduct in denying to a vessel of a friendly nation a general privilege, which is not only held sacred under the maritime law of nations, but which is expressly confirmed to the fishermen of the United States throughout the Atlantic coasts of British North America by the first article of the convention of 1818.

It does not appear that the A. R. Crittenden suffered other damage by this alleged inhospitable treatment, but reserving that point the incident affords an illustration of the vexatious spirit in which the officers of the Dominion of Canada appear to seek to penalize and oppress those fishing vessels of the United States, lawfully engaged in fishing, which from any cause are brought within their reach.

I have, etc.,

T. F. BAYARD.

I shall not encumber the RECORD by putting in all these letters. Suffice it to say that up to the time these negotiations began, the Secretary of State on and off, again and again, declared that the Canadian authorities were violating the treaty, and not only violating the treaty but violating the common courtesies that were due from one friendly nation to another. Not only did he so assert to the British Government, but he instructed our minister at London to so assert, and he did so assert on various occasions. As suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], he did that to American citizens who were demanding to know what their rights were, that they might not be led into a trap. He said: "Your rights are to go in there and buy." Now he asserts that no such right ever existed. When did he get the new light?

In a letter to Mr. Phelps on November 6, 1886, Mr. Bayard asserted this same right and directed him to assert it. He said, on page 437:

From Her Majesty's Government redress is asked. And that redress, as I shall have occasion to say hereafter, is not merely the indemnification of the parties suffering by Captain Quigley's actions, but his withdrawal from the waters where the outrages I represent to you have been committed.

I have already said that the claims thus presented could be abundantly sustained by the law of nations, aside from treaty and other rights. But I am not willing to rest the case on the law of nations. It is essential that the issue between United States fishing vessels and the "cruiser Terror" should be examined in all its bearings, and settled in regard not merely to the general law of nations, but to the particular rights of the parties aggrieved.

It is a fact that the fishing vessel Marion Grimes had as much right under the special relations of Great Britain and the United States to enter the harbor of Shelburne as had the Canadian cruiser. The fact that the Grimes was liable to penalties for the abuse of such right of entrance does not disprove its existence. Captain Quigley is certainly liable to penalties for his misconduct on the occasion referred to. Captain Landry was not guilty of misconduct in entering and seeking to leave that harbor, and had abused no privilege. But whether liable or not for subsequent abuse of the rights, I maintain that the right of free entrance into that port to obtain shelter, and whatever is incident thereto, belonged as much to the American fishing vessel as to the Canadian cruiser.

The basis of this right is thus declared by an eminent jurist and statesman, Mr. R. R. Livingston, the first Secretary of State appointed by the Continental Congress, in instructions issued on January 7, 1782, to Dr. Franklin, then at Paris, intrusted by the United States with the negotiation of articles of peace with Great Britain:

"The arguments on which the people of America found their claim to fish on the banks of Newfoundland arise, first, from their having once formed a part of the British Empire, in which state they always enjoyed as fully as the people of Britain themselves the right of fishing on those banks. They have shared in all the wars for the extension of that right, and Britain could with no more justice have excluded them from the enjoyment of it (even supposing that one nation could possess it to the exclusion of another) while they formed a part of that empire than they could exclude the people of London or Bristol.

"If so, the only inquiry is, how have we lost this right? If we were tenants in common with Great Britain while united with her, we still continue so, unless by our own act we have relinquished our title. Had we parted with mutual consent, we should doubtless have made partition of our common rights by treaty. But the oppressions of Great Britain forced us to a separation (which must be admitted, or we have no right to be independent); and it can not certainly be contended that those oppressions abridged our rights or gave new ones to Britain. Our rights, then, are not invalidated by this separation, more particularly as we have kept up our claim from the commencement of the war, and assigned the attempt of Great Britain to exclude us from the fisheries as one of the causes of our recurring to arms."

* * * * * * *

At present it is sufficient to say that the placing an armed cruiser at the mouth of a harbor in which the United States fishing vessels are accustomed and are entitled to seek shelter on their voyages, such cruiser being authorized to arrest and board our fishing vessels seeking such shelter, is an infraction not merely of the law of nations, but of a solemn treaty stipulation. That, so far as concerns the fishermen so affected, its consequences are far-reaching and destructive, it is not necessary here to argue. Fishing vessels only carry provisions enough for each particular voyage. If they are detained several days on their way to the fishing banks, the venture is broken up. The arrest and detention of one or two operates upon all. They can not, as a class, with their limited capital and resources, afford to run risks so ruinous.

Hence, rather than subject themselves to even the chances of suffering the wrongs inflicted by Captain Quigley, "of the Canadian cruiser Terror," on some of their associates, they might prefer to abandon their just claim to the shelter consecrated to them alike by humanity, ancient title, the law of nations, and by treaty, and face the gravest peril and the wildest seas in order to reach their fishing grounds. You will therefore represent to Her Majesty's Government that the placing Captain Quigley in the harbor of Shelburne to inflict wrongs and humiliation on United States fishermen there seeking shelter is, in connection with other methods of annoyance and injury, expelling United States fishermen from waters, access to which, of great importance in the pursuit of their trade, is pledged to them by Great Britain, not merely as an ancient right, but as part of a system of international settlement.

Here I should like to say that I have gone carefully over the correspondence of the American minister, Mr. Phelps, and I believe that he presented the case with great force. I do not know whether he has changed base, too. I do not know whether he will now be the apologist, like the Secretary of State and the Democratic Senate, of the Canadian officials; but I know that from time to time he asserted in language, as I have before said, verging to the extreme of diplomatic courtesy, that these transactions were without authority of law and were violative of the treaty. He said to Lord Iddesleigh, September 11, 1886:

To two recent instances of interference by Canadian officers with American fishermen, of a somewhat different character, I am specially instructed by my Government to ask your lordship's attention, those of the schooners Thomas F. Bayard and Mascot.

These vessels were proposing to fish in waters in which the right to fish is expressly secured to Americans by the terms of the treaty of 1818; the former in Bonne Bay, on the northwest coast of Newfoundland, and the latter near the shores of the Magdalen Islands.

For this purpose the Bayard attempted to purchase bait in the port of Bonne Bay, having reported at the custom-house and announced its object. The Mascot made a similar attempt at Port Amherst in the Magdalen Islands, and also desired to take on board a pilot. Both vessels were refused permission by the authorities to purchase bait, and the Mascot to take a pilot, and were notified to leave the ports within twenty-four hours on penalty of seizure. They were therefore compelled to depart, to break up their voyages, and to return home, to their very great loss. I append copies of the affidavits of the masters of these vessels stating the facts.

Your lordship will observe, upon reference to the treaty, not only that the right to fish in these waters is conferred by it, but that the clause prohibiting entry by American fishermen into Canadian ports, except for certain specified purposes, which is relied on by the Canadian Government in the cases of the Adams and of some other vessels, has no application whatever to the ports from which the Bayard and the Mascot were excluded. The only prohibition in the treaty having reference to those ports is against curing and drying fish there, without leave of the inhabitants, which the vessels excluded had no intention of doing.

The conduct of the provincial officers toward these vessels was therefore not merely unfriendly and injurious, but in clear and plain violation of the terms of the treaty. And I am instructed to say that reparation for the losses sustained by it to the owners of the vessels will be claimed by the United States Government on their behalf as soon as the amount can be accurately ascertained.

There are several letters from this minister of the same character asserting that our fishermen had rights there.

Mr. President, these assertions are in harmony with the construction given to the treaty of 1818 by the British Government themselves from time to time. I propose briefly to call the attention of the Senate to this point. I submit the letter of Mr. Phelps to Lord Roseberry of June 2, 1886, page 415, in which he details particularly the cases wherein the British Government had surrendered the headland theory and the right to exclude our fishermen from the bays.

* * * * * * *

The British Government has repeatedly refused to allow interference with American fishing vessels, unless for illegal fishing, and has given explicit orders to the contrary.

On the 26th of May, 1870, Mr. Thornton, the British minister at Washington, communicated officially to the Secretary of State of the United States copies of the orders addressed by the British Admiralty to Admiral Wellesley, commanding Her Majesty's naval forces on the North American station, and of a letter from the colonial department to the foreign office, in order that the Secretary might "see the nature of the instructions to be given to Her Majesty's and the Canadian officers employed in maintaining order at the fisheries in the neighborhood of the coasts of Canada." Among the documents thus transmitted is a letter from the foreign office to the secretary of the Admiralty, in which the following language is contained:

"The Canadian Government has recently determined, with the concurrence of Her Majesty's ministers, to increase the stringency of the existing practice of dispensing with the warnings hitherto given, and seizing at once any vessel detected in violation of the law.

"In view of this change and of the questions to which it may give rise, I am directed by Lord Granville to request that you will move their lordships to instruct the officers of Her Majesty's ships employed in the protection of the fisheries that they are not to seize any vessel unless it is evident and can be clearly proved that the offense of fishing has been committed and the vessel itself captured within 3 miles of land."

In the letter from the lords of the Admiralty to Vice-Admiral Wellesley of May 5, 1870, in accordance with the foregoing request, and transmitting the letter above quoted from, there occurs the following language:

"My lords desire me to remind you of the extreme importance of commanding officers of the ships selected to protect the fisheries exercising the utmost discretion in carrying out their instructions, paying special attention to Lord Granville's observation that no vessel should be seized unless it is evident and can be clearly proved that the offense of fishing has been committed and that the vessel is captured within 3 miles of land."

Lord Granville, in transmitting to Sir John Young the aforesaid instructions, makes use of the following language:

"Her Majesty's Government do not doubt that your ministers will agree with them as to the propriety of these instructions, and will give corresponding instructions to the vessels employed by them."

These instructions were again officially stated by the British minister at Washington to the Secretary of State of the United States in a letter dated June 11, 1870.

Again, in February, 1871, Lord Kimberly, colonial secretary, wrote to the governor-general of Canada as follows:

"The exclusion of American fishermen from resorting to Canadian ports, except for the purpose of shelter, and of repairing damages therein, purchasing wood, and of obtaining water, might be warranted by the letter of the treaty of 1818, and by the terms of the imperial act 59 George III, chapter 38, but Her Majesty's Government feel bound to state that it seems to them an extreme measure, inconsistent with the general policy of the empire, and they are disposed to concede this point to the United States Government under such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent smuggling, and to guard against any substantial invasion of the exclusive rights of fishing which may be reserved to British subjects."

And in a subsequent letter from the same source to the governor-general, the following language is used:

"I think it right, however, to add that the responsibility of determining what is the true construction of a treaty made by Her Majesty with any foreign power must remain with Her Majesty's Government, and that the degree to which this country would make itself a party to the strict enforcement of the treaty rights may depend not only on the literal construction of the treaty, but on the moderation and reasonableness with which these rights are asserted."

I am not aware that any modification of these instructions or any different rule from that therein contained has ever been adopted or sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government.

Judicial authority upon this question is to the same effect. That the purchase of bait by American fishermen in the provincial ports has been a common practice is well known. But in no case, so far as I can ascertain, has a seizure of an American vessel ever been enforced on the ground of the purchase of bait, or of any other supplies. On the hearing before the Halifax Fisheries Commission in 1877 this question was discussed, and no case could be produced of any such condemnation. Vessels shown to have been condemned were in all cases adjudged guilty, either of fishing, or preparing to fish, within the prohibited limit. And in the case of the White Fawn, tried in the admiralty court of New Brunswick before Judge Hazen in 1870, I understand it to have been distinctly held that the purchase of bait, unless proved to have been in preparation for illegal fishing, was not a violation of the treaty, nor of any existing law, and afforded no ground for proceedings against the vessel.

I also submit a paper found in Executive Document No. 113, marked Appendix B, showing the construction put upon the treaty by the British authorities:

APPENDIX B.

In such capacity your jurisdiction must be strictly confined within the limits of "3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors" of Canada, with respect to any action you may take against American fishing vessels and United States citizens engaged in fishing. Where any of the bays, creeks, or harbors shall not exceed 6 geographical miles in width, you will consider that the line of demarcation extends from headland to headland, either at the entrance to such bay, creek, or harbor, or from and between given points on both sides thereof, at any place nearest the mouth where the shores are less than 6 miles apart; and may exclude foreign fishermen and fishing vessels therefrom, or seize if found within 3 marine miles of the coast.

Jurisdiction.—The limits within which you will, if necessary, exercise the power to exclude the United States fishermen, or to detain American fishing vessels or boats, are for the present to be exceptional. Difficulties have arisen in former times with respect to the question whether the exclusive limits should be measured on lines drawn parallel everywhere to the coast and describing its sinuosities, or on lines produced from headland to headland across the entrances of bays, creeks, or harbors. Her Majesty's Government are clearly of opinion that by the convention of 1818 the United States have renounced the right of fishing not only within 3 miles of the colonial shores, but within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of any British bay or creek.

It is, however, the wish of Her Majesty's Government neither to concede, nor for the present to enforce any rights in this respect which are in their nature open to any serious question. Until further instructed, therefore, you will not interfere with any American fishermen unless found within 3 miles of the shore, or within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or a creek which, though in parts more than 6 miles wide, is less than 6 geographical miles in widthat its mouth. In the case of any other bay, as the Bay des Chaleurs for example, you will not interfere with any United States fishing vessel or boat, or any American fishermen, unless they are found within 3 miles of the shore.

"Action.—You will accost every United States vessel or boat actually within 3 marine miles of the shore along any other part of the coast except Labrador and around the Magdalen Islands, or within 3 marine miles of the entrance of any bay, harbor, or creek which is less than 6 geographical miles in width, or inside of a line drawn across any part of such bay harbor, or creek at points nearest to the mouth thereof not wider apart than 6 geographical miles, and if either fishing, preparing to fish, or having obviously fished within the exclusive limits, you will, in accordance with the above-recited acts, seize at once any vessel detected in violating the law, and send or take her into port for condemnation; but you are not to do so unless it is evident, and can be clearly proved, that the offense of fishing has been committed, and that the vessel is captured within the prohibited limits." (Session Papers, volume IV, No. 4, 1871.)

DOWNING STREET, October 10, 1870.

SIR: I inclose a copy of a memorandum, which I have requested Lord Granville to transmit to Sir E. Thornton, with instructions to communicate with you before addressing himself to the Government of United States on the subject to which the memorandum relates.

The object of Her Majesty's Government is, as you will observe, to give effect to the wishes of your Government, by appointing a joint commission, on which Great Britain, the United States, and Canada are to be represented, with the object of inquiring what ought to be the geographical limits of the exclusive fisheries of the British North American colonies. In accordance with the understood desire of your advisers it is proposed that the inquiry should be held in America.

The proposal contained in the last paragraph is made with a view to avoid diplomatic difficulties, which might otherwise attend the negotiation.

I have, etc.,

KIMBERLY.

Governor-General the Right Hon. Sir JOHN YOUNG, G. C. B., G. C. M. G.

We have both Houses of Congress and we have the Department of State in favor of our construction of the treaty of 1818. We have in addition to that the fact that the claim either to exclude us from bays or from lines drawn from headland to headland was not set up for many years after; that it was referred to by Secretary Everett in 1843 as a new claim made by the Canadians, and then not made by the British. We have all these things to justify us in insisting that the construction put upon the treaty by our predecessors is correct.

I think that is a sufficient answer to the Senators who have accused us of partisanship and a desire to antagonize this Administration, as well as a reply to the undignified interview in which the Secretary of State recently said, if the Baltimore Sun correctly reports him, that the Republican Senators were actuated only by a desire to embarrass the Administration. There is not a position that we have taken on this subject which has not been taken by the Secretary of State himself. There is not a position that we have taken on the treaty of 1818 that has not been taken by his minister to Great Britain.

What do Senators on the other side say? Do they suppose that the Secretary of State and the American minister were simply making a claim that they in truth knew did not in fact exist, or have they seen a new light under the manipulation or the advice of Sir Ambrose Shea, Joseph Chamberlain, and Sir Lionel West?

I said I would not take time to discuss the headland theory. It has been abandoned by Great Britain practically for years. It is abandoned now, or would have been but for this treaty. Mr. Tupper in discussing this question before the Canadian Parliament admitted that it had been abandoned.

So I think I may come to the treaty itself, and see whether there is anything in the treaty that is an improvement on the existing order of things.

I do not desire to go into any discussion of the right of the Secretary of State, or of the President, more properly speaking, to initiate this proceeding. I say that it was a most remarkable transaction, and I think it has no precedent in history, with the Senate of the United States about to convene, within ten days of its session, that the President should select a commission which should sit here for months during the session, and that he should not send in their names to the Senate for confirmation. But if the treaty was a good treaty, one commending itself to the American people and the American Senate, I should be in favor of waiving all these irregularities and of taking the treaty as it is. But such is not the case.

In the first place, we ought not to treat with Great Britain at all at this time. Such was almost the unanimous sense of the American Senate. It would have been unanimously held a year later, had the question been submitted, that we ought not to treat at all with all these outrages unredressed, with our ships boarded, taken into port, fined, hindered, injured, ruined in their business, and further, the American flag pulled down and insulted. Yet that has been done without an apology worthy of the name for these insults to the flag and the nation. We are asked to treat with Great Britain upon this question, to surrender that which was incontestably ours, as I intend to show when I take up the treaty in detail. We have under this proposed treaty nothing that we did not have without it. We have no opportunity for redress for the wrongs inflicted. We have, it is true, for the lowering of the flag what they call an apology.

Mr. President, I wish to say a word on that point, because on two or three occasions when this question has been up it has been said that Great Britain has apologized. I assert that Great Britain has never indicated the slightest compunction as to the Canadian conduct, and I do not know that Great Britain supposes she is liable for anything. Yet we do not deal with Canada. If an apology came at all, it should come from Great Britain. But let us hear what kind of an apology we got. I remember a year ago and more, when this matter was under discussion, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] said that there had been an apology. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who was discussing the question a little later, said that there had been an apology, but he said it was a very unsatisfactory apology. I say it was no apology at all. Let us hear what they said:

WASHINGTON, December 7, 1886.

SIR: I am instructed by the Earl of Iddesleigh to communicate to you the inclosed copy of a dispatch, with its inclosures, from the officer administering the Government of Canada, expressing the regret of the Dominion Government at the action of the captain of the Canadian cutter Terror in lowering the United States flag from the United States fishing schooner Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., while that vessel was under detention at Shelburne, Nova Scotia.

I have, etc.,

L. S. SACKVILLE WEST.

Here is the inclosure:

Acting Governor Lord A. G. Russell to Mr. Stanhope.

HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA, October 27, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of an approved minute of the privy council of Canada, expressing the regret of my Government at the action of the captain of the Canadian cutter Terror in lowering the United States flag from the United States fishing schooner Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., while that vessel was under detention at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, by the collector of customs at that port for an infraction of the customs regulations.

I have communicated a copy of this order in council to Her Majesty's minister at Washington.

I have, etc.,

A. G. RUSSELL, General.

This is the next inclosure:

[Inclosure 2 in No. 57.]

Report of a committee of the honorable the privy council for Canada, approved by his excellency the administrator of the Government in council on the 26th October, 1886.

On a report, dated the 14th October, 1886, from Hon. Mackenzie Bowell, for the minister of marine and fisheries, stating that on Monday, the 11th October instant, the United States fishing schooner Marion Grimes, of Gloucester, Mass., was under detention at Shelburne, Nova Scotia, by the collector of customs at that port for an infraction of the customs regulations; that while so detained, and under the surveillance of the Canadian Government cutter Terror, the captain of the Marion Grimes hoisted the United States flag.

The minister further states that it appears that Captain Quigley, of the Terror, considered such act as an intimation that there was an intention to rescue the vessel, and requested Captain Landry to take the flag down. This request was complied with. An hour later, however, the flag was again hoisted, and on Captain Landry being asked if his vessel had been released, and replying that she had not, Captain Quigley again requested that the flag be lowered. This was refused, when Captain Quigley himself lowered the flag, acting under the belief that while the Marion Grimes was in possession of the customs authorities, and until her case had been adjudicated upon, the vessel had no right to fly the United States flag.

Now, here is the apology, Mr. President.

The minister regrets that he should have acted with undue zeal, although Captain Quigley may have been technically within his right while the vessel was in the custody of the law.

The committee advise that your excellency be moved to forward a copy of this minute, if approved, to the right honorable the secretary of state for the colonies, and to Her Majesty's minister at Washington, expressing the regret of the Canadian Government at the occurrence.

All of which is respectfully submitted for your excellency's approval.

JOHN J. McGEE,
Clerk, Privy Council.

Mr. President, I assert that no international lawyer in the Senate or anywhere will stand up and claim that before adjudication there is any right in the Government seizing a vessel to take down its flag. It is a universal law of the world that the flag flies until the adjudication determines the question of the right of seizure. So these Canadian authorities simply regretted that Captain Quigley acted with undue zeal, and then asserted the right to pull down the American flag whenever they seized a vessel, and it is only a question with them of policy and not a question of law.

The State Department knew that that was not the international law, for the Secretary of State himself, in one of his letters to Mr. Phelps, declares that the Canadians had no right to take down the flag until it was determined there was a rightful and proper seizure of the vessel.

Mr. President, how long do you think they would have been without an apology of a proper kind if we had pulled down the British flag floating over a Canadian fisherman? How long do you think it would have been before we should have been notified that we were to disavow the act of that officer or to make an humble apology?

Great Britain does not proceed in that way when her flag is insulted. She does not wait. Neither have we been wont to wait when the American flag was assailed. It is left for this Administration to accept an apology which says, "We had a right to take down your flag; you ought not to complain; we think it was a little undue zeal on the part of our officer, and yet the right exists." Out upon such an apology, Mr. President! It ought to make every American ashamed, and it does. I know that there are men in the Democratic party who are ashamed of it. I am sorry to say that they seem to have lost the courage to say what they must think, and what all honest, upright, brave people must think of such a transaction.

Once upon an occasion an overzealous United States naval officer seized two Confederate messengers going abroad. You may remember it. It was in the fall of 1861. He seized a British ship because it was carrying contraband passengers, but instead of complying with the law of nations and bringing in the ship, he let the ship go and took out of it the men, and thus put himself beyond the pale of international law. What did the British Government do with us then? They gave us notice that we should return those men to British control and authority inside of seven days or there would be war. They did not wait seven days before they started by the quickest transportation in their power their troops to the Canadian provinces.

There is not a man here who does not know that there is not any nation in the world who would dare to do such a thing to Great Britain; and are they to get off with an apology of the character I have read? I do not wonder that the Senator from Maryland said that it was not a satisfactory apology.

But, Mr. President, it is in keeping with the whole course of this Administration on this question. It is in keeping with the whole course of the Administration in its dealings with the British Government. I can not assume that the Administration was afraid to demand a sufficient apology. I must assume that the Administration is not sufficiently alive to indignities inflicted upon this country. That is the excuse, and that probably is the only one. If it had been sufficiently alive to the wrongs inflicted no treaty would have been made, no negotiation would have been entered into until there had been some redress at least promised for all the wrongs inflicted upon us by the Canadian officials.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate briefly to some provisions of the new treaty and then I shall not detain the Senate longer upon this subject. The treaty comes here with the President's approval. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] says it comes with great presumptive weight. He says that a treaty always comes with great presumptive weight from an administration, and it always has it. Time and again a Republican administration has sent to a Republican Senate treaties which have been rejected, and rejected, too, by Republican votes. When was it that the American Senate became subordinate to the executive department in considering these subjects and determining what treaties ought and what ought not to be ratified? With great presumptive weight! The President, after detailing the treaty, says:

The treaty meets my approval, because I believe that it supplies a satisfactory, practical, and final adjustment, upon a basis honorable and just to both parties, of the difficult and vexed question to which it relates.

A review of the history of this question will show that all former attempts to arrive at a common interpretation, satisfactory to both parties, of the first article of the treaty of October 20, 1818, have been unsuccessful; and with the lapse of time the difficulty and obscurity have only increased.

* * * * * * *

But I believe the treaty will be found to contain a just, honorable, and therefore satisfactory solution of the difficulties which have clouded our relations with our neighbors on our northern border.

Especially satisfactory do I believe the proposed arrangement will be found by those of our citizens who are engaged in the open-sea fisheries, adjacent to the Canadian coast, and resorting to those ports and harbors under the treaty provisions and rules of international law.

The proposed delimitation of the lines of the exclusive fisheries from the common fisheries will give certainty and security as to the area of their legitimate field; the headland theory of imaginary lines is abandoned by Great Britain, and the specifications in the treaty of certain named bays especially provided for gives satisfaction to the inhabitants of the shores, without subtracting materially from the value or convenience of the fishery rights of Americans.

The uninterrupted navigation of the Strait of Canso is expressly and for the first time affirmed.

I shall show that the President could not have read the treaty with care or he would not have made that assertion—and the four purposes for which our fishermen under the treaty of 1818 were allowed to enter the bays and harbors of Canada and Newfoundland within the belt of 3 marine miles are placed under a fair and liberal construction, and their enjoyment secured without such conditions and restrictions as in the past have embarrassed and obstructed them so seriously.

I do not wonder that Mr. Tupper pointed to this and said with great glee, "What will that do for us when we come to negotiate again?" Here is the President of the United States telling the whole world that our interpretation of the treaty is a fair, honorable, and just one; and that the treaty is all that the Americans can expect. Then the President follows with his explanations. Now, let us see what the President says about the commercial rights that the Secretary of State had declared to American citizens existed, and which they had been encouraged to assert under this Administration:

The right of our fishermen under the treaty of 1818 did not extend to the procurement of distinctive fishery supplies in Canadian ports and harbors; and one item, supposed to be essential, to wit, bait, was plainly denied them by the explicit and definite words of the treaty of 1818, emphasized by the course of the negotiation and express decisions which preceded the conclusion of that treaty.

Who is at fault, the President of the United States or the Secretary of State? Both can not be right.

I now desire to briefly call attention to the proposed treaty itself. I shall speak of only one or two sections to any extent, and I shall not dwell very much on those.

In brief, the treaty provides for a commission, two commissioners to be selected by the Government of the United States, and two to be selected by the British Government, and in case of a disagreement an umpire to be selected. These commissioners are to be appointed for the purpose of delimiting the several bays. Without, however, waiting for that, the treaty proposes that the delimitation shall be made in the manner described, and then proceeds to make some of the delimitations without waiting for the commission.

The delimitation shall be made in the following manner, and shall be accepted by both the high contracting parties as applicable for all purposes under Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, between the United States and Great Britain.

The 3 marine miles mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818, shall be measured seaward from low-water mark; but at every bay, creek, or harbor, not otherwise specially provided for in this treaty, such 3 marine miles shall be measured seaward from a straight line drawn across the bay, creek, or harbor, in the part nearest the entrance at the first point where the width does not exceed 10 miles.

The Senator from Delaware went into an extended argument to show that 3 marine miles was not the present international law, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] went into an extended argument to show that the British owned all the country up there, and therefore allowing us to come within the 10 miles was quite a favor.

It is not necessary for us to consider what the international law is upon this subject. We had a treaty. We had fixed 3 miles. That had received its construction, which was, that the smaller bays that were 6 miles or less were included in the prohibited waters; but now bays that are 10 miles wide are to be included in the prohibited waters. Bays that are much wider than that are prohibited by the delimitation in this treaty, and yet the President of the United States says that these delimitations "will give certainty and security" to the people of the United States who want to fish in those waters.

The proposed delimitation of the lines of the exclusive fisheries from the common fisheries will give certainty and security as to the area of their legitimate field.

Mr. President, is that possible? How can a fisherman see who is to keep outside of 3 miles, the line drawn from another invisible line that is 10 miles long, being more than 6 or 8 miles out from shore, and how can it benefit him any to have these delimitations? It only opens the door for more difficulty and more confusion and more trouble on the part of the fisherman. What he could see and might escape before, he can not see now and can not escape. To say nothing of the great surrender of a large area of fishing ground that is rightfully ours, we are adding to the embarrassment of every man who goes into those waters to fish by lengthening the line so as to keep him from the shore, making it more difficult for him to determine where he is.

Then follow, in Article IV, the bays which are delimited, of which I have not time to speak at any length. Then comes Article V:

ARTICLE V.

Nothing in this treaty shall be construed to include within the common waters any such interior portions of any bays, creeks, or harbors as can not be reached from the sea without passing within the 3 marine miles mentioned in Article I of the convention of October 20, 1818.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to what Sir Charles Tupper says about that, and why he says that was put in. Mr. Mills, of Bothwell, asked him why this provision was inserted, and he said:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am obliged to my honorable friend for his question, and I will give him a most explicit and, I am quite sure, a satisfactory answer. I hold the delineation of a bay in my hands. It is imaginary, it is true, but it is none the less just what you may meet with at the mouth of any bay. This bay is 15 miles from mainland to mainland, and yet under the instructions of my honorable friend from Northumberland [Mr. Mitchell] not to go within 3 miles of the shore they could not get into that bay. Why? Because there are islands in the mouth of the bay, and the island carries its 3 miles of marine jurisdiction stretched around it, the same as the mainland. I will send it over to my honorable friend to show him just what that article means, and the reason why it was necessary, in order to provide for a possible contingency by which a bay being 15 miles wide they could not get into it now. I said: You do not propose by that 10-mile arrangement to enter a bay that you could not enter under the 6-mile arrangement, do you? Certainly not. Then I gave them this delineation, and that clause was put in the treaty for the purpose of giving effect to it, and to prevent giving any possible uncertainty. Now, sir, as I said before, we were met in a broad and liberal spirit, and I think the sentiment that animated us on both sides was that we owed it to each other and to the countries we represented not to quarrel over points that could be satisfactorily adjusted.

That was put in there, it seems, for the benefit of the Canadians, and not for us.

I do not care to look at the other articles, except Article IX, which refers to the Strait of Canso.

ARTICLE IX.

Nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States.

The President of the United States declares in his message to Congress that this guaranties to us some rights that we did not have before. It has simply said as to the Strait of Canso that it leaves it right where it is. Any claim that the British Government ever made to that strait they can make to-day notwithstanding this treaty. What claims they have made in the past I do not care at this late hour to undertake to cite, and I shall not speak of the character of their claims.

We come now to Article X, which is supposed to have great merit. It was much dwelt on by some of the Senators who have discussed this question. It provides, speaking of our vessels, that—

They need not report, enter, or clear, when putting into such bays or harbors for shelter or repairing damages, nor when putting into the same, outside the limits of established ports of entry, for the purpose of purchasing wood or of obtaining water; except that any such vessel remaining more than twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sundays and legal holidays, within any such port, or communicating with the shore therein, may be required to report, enter, or clear; and no vessel shall be excused hereby from giving due information to boarding officers. * * *

Mr. President, is there very much in that? Is there very much in the provision that they need enter and clear except under certain circumstances? Mr. Tupper says that if they communicate with the shore for any purpose they must enter and clear. Mr. Tupper said that he did not think it was worth while to insist upon their entering and clearing; that we did not do that with the British vessels which came into our ports under like circumstances; and he said they took the testimony of one of the oldest collectors in the country, the collector of the port of Portland, who asserted that for thirty years he had never known a vessel to be disturbed for remaining more than twenty-four hours without entering and clearing. Whatever might be the statute which was recited by the Senator from Delaware, it has been a dead letter as applied to Canadian vessels. If the fisherman communicates with the shore to get wood, or water, or a doctor, or for any other purpose whatever, he must enter and clear. There is no concession there at all. That is the very extent that any nation requires of people coming into its ports. This article refers to those who come for shelter and repairing damages, for the purchase of wood, or to obtain water, and then they need not, unless they communicate, and as they must communicate it amounts to saying that they shall enter and clear.

Article X also provides that—

They shall not be liable in any such bays or harbors for compulsory pilotage.

Mr. Tupper said that the Canadian fishermen were not subject to that in American ports, and I understand that to be the rule. They are not in New England. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] thinks they are perhaps in some of the Southern ports. Perhaps there was a reservation some years ago in a statute to that effect. However, I think Mr. Tupper made the statement that there were no compulsory pilotage dues exacted here. I have a reference to it.

Article XI is claimed to have great merit, and to be a very great concession by the Canadian Government to us. It is one of the strong points in this treaty; it is one of the things on account of which it is urged upon our attention. That article provides:

United States fishing vessels entering the ports, bays, and harbors of the eastern and northeastern coasts of Canada, or of the coasts of Newfoundland under stress of weather or other casualty, may unload, reload, transship, or sell, subject to customs laws and regulations, all fish on board, when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is made necessary as incidental to repairs, and may replenish outfits, provisions, and supplies damaged or lost by disaster; and in case of death or sickness shall be allowed all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews.

In 1794, when we were denied commercial relations with Great Britain, not only in Canada, but in all British colonies, we made a treaty with Great Britain which contained stipulations of greater value than this. The stipulation then was not only that we might do all that is now proposed to be done, but we might go further and barter our merchandise for such things as we needed.

There is nothing in this provision of the treaty, as Mr. Tupper says. He says the Canadian Government ought to be ashamed to deny to any foreigners the privileges that are conceded here, not the privileges conceded here as claimed by the Senator from Delaware, not the privileges conceded if the President and Secretary of State are correct, but according to his interpretation, which is in accordance with the interpretation put upon it by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] the other day when he addressed the Senate.

The article refers only to vessels that go in there under stress of weather or other casualty, and when they so go in they may do what? Unload, reload, transship, or sell, subject to customs laws and regulations? Oh, no, not that. They may do all that when such unloading, transshipment, or sale is necessary as incidental to repairs. When they are in such distress that they can not keep their cargo afloat in their vessels, then they may apply to the British authorities, and if the British authorities think it is a case of distress, of casualty, they may be allowed to ship, provided they show that it is necessary as incidental to repairs. If they can not make their repairs without it, then they may do it. It is a barren right. It is of no earthly account, and was not intended to be.

"In case of death or sickness" they shall have "all needful facilities, including the shipping of crews." All this is dependent, first, upon the fact that they are driven in by stress of weather; then that the Canadian authorities think it is incidental to repairs, or that it is necessary. With the disposition that the Canadian authorities have shown toward our fishermen for the last few years, how much benefit do you suppose our fishermen will derive under that provision of the treaty?

There is another clause in Article XI which the Senator from Delaware insisted was an unrestricted license to trade by fishermen, or that at least was the theory upon which he went.

Licenses to purchase in established ports of entry of the aforesaid coasts of Canada or of Newfoundland, for the homeward voyage, such provisions and supplies as are ordinarily sold to trading vessels, shall be granted to United States fishing vessels in such ports, promptly upon application and without charge; and such vessels having obtained licenses in the manner aforesaid shall also be accorded upon all occasions such facilities for the purchase of casual or needful provisions and supplies as are ordinarily granted to the trading vessels; but such provisions or supplies shall not be obtained by barter, nor purchased for resale or traffic.

The Senator from Delaware insisted the other day that this was an unlimited right to purchase for the homeward voyage such provisions as were ordinarily sold to trading vessels. This license only applies to vessels that have gone into these ports in stress of weather. It only applies to such vessels as go there because they could not keep out, to such vessels as come in in distress or by reason of some disaster that has occurred or will occur if they stay out. It is only to that class of vessels that this license is granted.

Then what are they to buy? For the homeward voyage only. If they come in in the beginning of their fishing season, before they have had time to fish and get ready to return, and if they meet disaster and lose a portion of their supplies, they can not go in and buy. It is only when they can satisfy the Canadian Government that they are on the homeward move, and that they will starve to death, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], before they get home if they can not buy.

Between two great nations speaking the same language, having so many things in common, do we need a treaty for things like that? Can Great Britain afford to deny to the distressed fishermen of this country or any other that come into her ports the right to purchase supplies to take them home? There is no nation to-day on earth that denies that to the distressed mariner. Yet that provision is put in this treaty and it is held up to us as a great merit, one which we should surrender almost anything to secure, and because we do not see it in that light we are moved wholly and solely by partisan zeal and by a desire to embarrass the Administration!

I said that Mr. Tupper did not entertain the same views about this that the Senator from Delaware entertains. I will call attention now to what Mr. Tupper said about it. After quoting Article XI of the treaty, he said:

That was another concession. There is no doubt at all, sir, that these were rights which under the strict terms of the treaty of 1818 they could not demand, nor could they insist upon them being granted; but at the same time I think I am within the judgment of the house on both sides when I say that in the case of a vessel which is homeward bound and requires provisions or needful supplies to take her home, if, for instance, she has some of her rigging carried away, or some of her salt washed overboard, and is obliged to lose her voyage in going back to a distant port to refit, a provision that she may obtain casual and needful supplies of that kind was demanded in the interests of good neighborhood, and it was not going too far to say that we would allow them to enjoy those advantages. Therefore, sir, I am glad to belive that Article XI will meet with the hearty approval of the house and the country, and that they will feel that we have only acted with a wise judgment, and with due regard to the best interests of Canada for the sake of removing an international unpleasantness, in putting these provisions into this treaty.

It is very clear that Mr. Tupper does not understand it as the Senator from Delaware does; it is very clear that if this treaty is ratified it opens the door for further controversy, for when the man who made it on the part of the Canadian Government gives it one construction and the Senator from Delaware, representing the Administration, gives it another, it is fair to presume that this will not cease to be a subject of controversy, but will hereafter continue to be a subject of controversy as others have been heretofore.

So there is nothing in that which has not been granted for more than fifty years to every Canadian vessel in the United States wherever she has gone.

I come now to a remarkable section as to the numbering of fishing vessels. I do not desire to spend much time upon it. I find that we are to number in a conspicuous manner every United States vessel, to have "its official number on each bow." It shall be plainly marked, be conspicuous, so that all can see it, and we shall make such regulations concerning it as we may think proper; but before they take effect we are to submit them to Her Majesty's Government; I do not know for what, whether for approval or disapproval, but the regulations can not take effect, at all events, until we have submitted them. How long is it since we have submitted questions of this kind to a foreign power? Some years ago, about 1852, when there was some trouble up on the Canadian border, an English cruiser was called upon to seize some American vessels that the Canadian authorities said were intruding and violating the provisions of the treaty, or if not the treaty, some of their local statutes, and the British officer replied, "How am I to know whether they are American vessels or not? Are they marked?" Now it is proposed that there shall be no trouble of that kind hereafter. They are to be marked. They will be marked if this treaty should become operative; but it will not.

Now I come to Article XIV, which I think is a very remarkable one. I confess, if everything else had been according to my judgment, that the reading of this article alone would render it utterly impossible for me, with my ideas of right and duty, to vote for this treaty.

ARTICLE XIV.

The penalties for unlawfully fishing in the waters, bays, creeks, and harbors, referred to in Article I of this treaty, may extend to forfeiture of the boat or vessel, and appurtenances, and also of the supplies and cargo aboard when the offense was committed; and for preparing in such waters to unlawfully fish therein, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not to exceed those for unlawfully fishing, and for any other violation of the laws of Great Britain, Canada, or Newfoundland relating to the right of fishery in such waters, bays, creeks, or harbors, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not exceeding in all $3 for every ton of the boat or vessel concerned. The boat or vessel may be holden for penalties and forfeitures.

We were told by Senators who addressed the Senate that this was a valuable provision, because we knew just the penalties to be attached; we knew just what the fishermen would suffer. When the Barbary State pirates went out from the African coast and seized a vessel that was sailing by, they confiscated the cargo and they confiscated the ship and sold the men into slavery; and there is nothing more left for the British Government to do, unless when it gets a ship and the cargo it should propose to sell the men.

Somebody said when this was under discussion heretofore, that the men escaped with their lives. They take all a man has got; they take his ship, they take his stock in trade, his fish, and everything on the vessel. For what? For fishing in waters as to which he can not tell when he goes out without a marine-glass, and frequently can not tell with a glass, whether he is within the prohibited waters or not. No matter how he gets there, anxious as he may be to keep within the waters that are unquestionably his, to keep out of the forbidden waters, if by wind or tide he finds himself, or a Canadian official asserts that he is, within the forbidden waters, he loses his ship and he loses his cargo. He does not lose his life! What a wonderful condescension after they take all the poor devil has.

The offense of fishing in English waters willfully and corruptly might justify the forfeiture of the vessel; but does it justify it where it is done by mistake? There is no saving clause; there is no assertion that if he purposely goes there he shall suffer; there is no way that he can get out by pleading that he was carried in by the great tides that rise twenty-odd feet and flow with a velocity which will carry fishermen out of their soundings and beyond their reckonings; and yet if a fisherman goes in there perforce of wind and weather he is to be seized by these people who have for years shown themselves to be the deadly enemies of our fishermen, and who have declared officially that every American fisherman who came into those waters is an injury to Canadian interests, and that they intend, if they can, to deprive us of the privilege of fishing in those waters. And yet we are told that this is a treaty that the American Senate ought to ratify in this year 1888!

Mr. President, I say it is a barbarism to punish any man with forfeiture of his boat and the forfeiture of his cargo who does not go there with willful intention to violate the law, and there ought to have been a provision in this treaty that only in case of willful violation of the law should fishermen be amenable to such extreme penalties.

Then, "preparing to fish," mending his nets within the waters with intent "to unlawfully fish therein."

I do not know whether this means unlawfully fishing within the forbidden waters, but I will assume that it does for this argument. I will concede that it does.

What is "preparing to fish?" Mending his nets, getting ready his lines, fixing up his ship; and who is to determine whether he is preparing to fish in the forbidden waters, and if he is found guilty, what is the penalty? They were careful to say "for unlawful fishing."

For preparing in such waters to unlawfully fish therein, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not to exceed those for unlawfully fishing.

So for preparing to fish they may forfeit his vessel, they may forfeit his cargo, they may turn him adrift in a Canadian port to get home as best he may, and they may do it upon the testimony of the men who become the owners of one-half of his ship and one-half of his cargo; and when he is seized for preparing to fish and taken into a British port he must prove that he was not preparing to fish, and he must prove that he was not preparing to fish within the forbidden waters. The burden of proof is on him. Every fact that is necessary to establish his defense he must prove affirmatively.

The Senator from Delaware and other Senators have attempted to make it appear that this is but the usual customs law. This is not true. It is a different thing. The rule is that where a man has a license to do a certain thing and he is arrested and it is charged that he had not a license, he must produce the license, and the burden of proof is on him because the proof is supposed to be with him. But when a vessel is seized for being over the line, when it is seized for preparing to fish or unlawfully fishing, he has the burden of proof on him. Can he better produce the proof than the other party? Do we not reverse all the ordinary rules of courts and all the ordinary rules that apply to transactions between men, and put him in a hostile court away from home with the witnesses interested in securing his condemnation, and put him upon the proof? Why, sir, it is a most outrageous provision in the treaty, and I have the authority of the Secretary of State that it is an outrageous provision in the statute; I have the authority of his minister to Great Britain that it is outrageous to thus proceed.

Mr. Phelps, speaking of this very principle, said in a letter of December 2, 1886:

Mr. Phelps to Lord Iddesleigh.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, London, December 2, 1886.

MY LORD: Referring to the conversation I had the honor to hold with your lordship on the 30th November, relative to the request of my Government that the owners of the David J. Adams may be furnished with a copy of the original reports, stating the charges on which that vessel was seized by the Canadian authorities, I desire now to place before you in writing the grounds upon which this request is preferred.

In the suit that is now going on in the admiralty court at Halifax, for the purpose of condemning the vessel, still further charges have been added. And the Government of Canada seek to avail themselves of a clause in the act of the Canadian Parliament of May 22, 1868, which is in these words: "In case a dispute arises as to whether any seizure has or has not been legally made or as to whether the person seizing was or was not authorized to seize under this act * * * the burden of proving the illegality of the seizure shall be on the owner or claimant."

I can not quote this provision without saying that it is, in my judgment, in violation of the principles of natural justice, as well as of those of the common law. That a man should be charged by police or executive officers with the commission of an offense and then be condemned upon trial unless he can prove himself to be innocent is a proposition that is incompatible with the fundamental ideas upon which the administration of justice proceeds. But it is sought in the present case to carry the proposition much further, and to hold that the party inculpated must not only prove himself innocent of the offense on which his vessel was seized, but also of all other charges upon which it might have been seized that may be afterward brought forward and set up at the trial.

What will be the opportunity of the American fisherman to escape condemnation in a Canadian court—seizing him for one thing and compelling him to prove that he was not guilty of another? Why, Mr. President, it is a cunningly-devised scheme to confiscate the property of American citizens. It is not much better in my judgment, nay, I doubt whether it is any better, than the system by which the pirates went out and seized the vessels as they passed by. For them, at least, there was a chance for a fair fight, but there is none given to these men, either before or after. Lord Iddesleigh replied to this by saying it was the usual customs law. Mr. Phelps denied it. I quote what Lord Iddesleigh said:

With respect to the statement in your note that a clause in the Canadian act of May 22, 1868, to the effect that, "in case a dispute arises as to whether any seizure has or has not been legally made, or as to whether the person seizing was or was not authorized to seize under this act, the burden of proving the illegality of the seizure shall be on the owner or claimant," is in violation of the principles of national justice, as well as those of the common law, I have to observe that the statutes referred to is cap. 61 of 1868, which provides for the issue of licenses to foreign fishing vessels, and for the forfeiture of such vessels fishing without a license; and that the provisions of Article X, to which you take exception, are commonly found in laws against smuggling, and are based on the rule of law that a man who pleads that he holds a license or other similar document shall be put to the proof of his plea and required to produce the document.

I beg leave to add that the provisions of that statute, so far as they relate to the issue of licenses, has been in operation since the year 1870.

I have, etc.,

IDDESLEIGH.

To this Mr. Phelps replied:

It is in the act to which the one above referred to is an amendment that is found the provision to which I drew attention in a note to Lord Iddesleigh of December 2, 1886, by which it is enacted that in case a dispute arises as to whether any seizure has or has not been legally made, the burden of proving the illegality of the seizure shall be upon the owner or claimant.

In his reply to that note of January 11, 1887, his lordship intimates that this provision is intended only to impose upon a person claiming a license the burden of proving it. But a reference to the act shows that such is by no means the restriction of the enactment. It refers in the broadest and clearest terms to any seizure that is made under the provisions of the act, which covers the whole subject of protection against illegal fishing; and it applies not only to the proof of a license to fish, but to all questions of fact whatever, necessary to a determination as to the legality of a seizure or the authority of the person making it.

There is no mistaking what this act means. It is not in accordance with our acts. We have nothing of that kind on our statute-books. Mr. Bayard's attention was called to it, and in a letter to Mr. Phelps, of January 27, 1887, Mr. Bayard said:

Mr. Bayard to Mr. Phelps.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, January 27, 1887.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 416, of the 12th instant, transmitting a copy of the note dated the 11th, received by you from the late Lord Iddesleigh, in response to your note of December 2, 1886, requesting copies of the papers in the case of the David J. Adams, has been received.

* * * * * * *

The concluding part of Lord Iddesleigh's note seems to demand attention, inasmuch as the argument employed to justify the provisions of article 10 of the Canadian Statutes, cap. 61 of 1868, which throw on the claimant the burden of proving the illegality of a seizure, appears to rest upon the continued operation of article 1 of that statute, relative to the issue of licenses to foreign fishing vessels. The note in question states "that the provisions of that statute, so far as they relate to the issues of licenses, has [have?] been in operation since the year 1870."

It appears from the correspondence exchanged in 1870 between this Department and Her Majesty's minister in Washington (see the volume of Foreign Relations, 1870, pages 407–411) that on the 8th of January, 1870, an order in council of the Canadian Government decreed "that the system of granting fishing license to foreign vessels under the act 31 Vic., cap. 61, be discontinued, and that henceforth all foreign fishermen be prevented from fishing in the waters of Canada."

During the continuance of the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington Canadian fishing licenses were not required for fishermen of the United States, and since the termination of those articles, July 1, 1885, this Department has not been advised of the resumption of the licensing system under the statute aforesaid.

This is an old statute. I desire to call attention to what has been said about it heretofore. It does not seem necessary that anybody should be cited as authority on a question of that kind. It does seem to me that every fair-minded man will see that the law is an odious law, that it is liable to great abuse, and to bring our fishermen within that law is to expose them to great disaster. I have here Mr. Forsyth's letter to Lord Aberdeen commenting on this, and I will read it from Sabine's Report on Fisheries, because it is the handiest book to read. He says:

Well did Mr. Forsyth say that some of its provisions were "violations of well-established principles of the common law of England and of the principles of all just powers and all civilized nations, and seemed to be expressly designed to enable Her Majesty's authorities with perfect impunity to seize and confiscate American vessels, and to embezzle, almost indiscriminately, the property of our citizens employed in the fisheries on the coast of the British possessions." Well, too, did Mr. Everett stigmatize it as possessing "none of the qualities of the law of civilized states but its forms;" and Mr. Davis, as being "a law of shameful character," and "evidently designed to legalize marauding upon an industrious, enterprising class of men, who have no means to contend with such sharp and unwarrantable weapons of warfare."

So, Mr. President, the provision that they shall take nothing from these people who are guilty of unlawful fishing, and those who are preparing to fish, etc., but their fishing vessels and cargoes, is, under the circumstances the way the law is administered, an extremely harsh provision. But they were not satisfied with that, and further penalties are provided:

And for any other violation of the laws of Great Britain, Canada, or Newfoundland relating to the right of fishery in such waters, bays, creeks, or harbors, penalties shall be fixed by the court, not exceeding in all $3 for every ton of the boat or vessel concerned. The boat or vessel may be holden for such penalties and forfeitures.

This is the first time that the United States has anywhere recognized the right of the Canadian authorities to legislate in such a way as to interfere with the rights of American fishermen under the treaty of 1818. We have asserted over and over again that all this legislation was without authority of law, that we would not submit to have the Canadian authorities providing what we might do or what we might not do, except so far as provided for in treaty; and it is a notable fact that Great Britain never ratified or approved any acts of this character until 1886—until within the history of this present Administration.

When this Administration came into power they were not attempting and did not dare to attempt to enforce these Canadian laws. It was out of an attempt to enforce these Canadian laws as to fishing on Sunday that the controversy arose in which the Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, compelled a payment by the British Government. Now we have agreed in this treaty, if it becomes the law, that every petty British North American province and Canada and Great Britain can pass any law upon the subject of fishing that they see fit, and we are bound by it. They fix the size of the meshes of the seine; they fix when it may be thrown and when it may be drawn; they tell us that we can not fish on Sunday or on the Queen's holidays, or any other time; and for the violation of such laws the American fisherman is liable to punishment in a Canadian court, administered, as I said before, by a hostile people.

They may fish, as it is suggested, in the open seas, as they have done, to which we have paid no attention so far; but our men are liable to be punished for violations of this kind of legislation, which we shall be estopped from complaining of, because we here say they have a right to made it if they see fit, and we reserve to ourselves no right of criticism. They may be taken into a Canadian court where they can be fined $3 per ton on their vessel, and a vessel of 100 tons could be fined $300, and how often may that be repeated? As often as any officious Canada official, moved by his desire to get part of the plunder that shall be taken from these fishermen, institutes a prosecution in the Canadian courts.

It is true they have provided in this treaty that "the proceedings shall be summary and as inexpensive as practicable." But what of that? It may be of some advantage to a poor fisherman who is to be ruined to know how quickly he is to be ruined. It may be also of some advantage to his Canadian opponent to put him through the court on quick time, that he may try him again, because he can be picked up for all sorts of complaints. I think there is quite as much for Canada in that as there is for us, so far as the prompt proceedings are concerned.

Is there anybody living who has studied this question and who knows the temper of the Canadians, who knows the difficulties surrounding the fishermen, who does not know that where there has heretofore been one case of conflict between the Canadians and our fishermen there will be a hundred such conflicts under this treaty? Does not everybody know that we are opening the door for continued agitation and continued trouble?

It must be evident to everybody that when we surrender to the British Government the right to fix the season in which we may fish, the methods by which we may fish, the character of the fish that we may put in our barrels, and all this, we have subjected our people to such a condition of things as renders fishing absolutely worthless, and I do not hesitate to say here that, in my judgment—and I believe in the judgment of men better qualified to judge than I—that in two years they will make it impossible for American fishermen under this treaty to fish in waters where our rights are as unquestioned as they are in the Delaware Bay.

There is one other provision in the treaty of which I will not speak at length, and that is Article XV. That is where we agree to buy commercial privileges at an expense, Mr. Tupper says, of about $1,800,000 a year.

Mr. FRYE. Limited commericial privileges.

Mr. TELLER. Limited commercial privileges, commercial privileges which I insist Canadian vessels have had for fifty years everywhere in our ports, unless it may be in some few of the South Atlantic ports, and I do not believe they have ever been disturbed in them there, but on all the New England coast and in all the great harbors of this country they can go and do what we propose to pay to the British Government $1,800,000 a year for, in the removal of import duties.

The fifteenth article is what they started out for when they began this negotiation. Mr. Tupper declared that he came here, and he supposed that what they were to do was to get up a reciprocity treaty, and he cites Mr. Bayard's letter in proof of it, and nobody can doubt it. I do not know that anybody disputes it. So there is a combination, a union, between the Democratic party and the British party to secure to them legislation through this fisheries excitement that they could not hope and could not expect otherwise to obtain.

I will not go through with this matter in detail. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] touched it with great power and presented it in a way that it seemed to me ought to have made every American blush for his Government. One thing is certain, Mr. President. The masterly way in which he presented it caused the Secretary of State, usually calm and collected, to forget the high position which he occupies, and induced him to submit himself to a newspaper interview, wherein he speaks of the speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts in terms more consistent with a fish-market than with a diplomatic position, and in that same interview he takes occasion to say that the Republican members of the American Senate are not honest, that we are not truthful when we say that we do not regard this as a proper treaty, that we are moved simply by our hatred of the Democratic Administration, and then he slaps himself on the chest and declares that he is above partisanship, and he only of all people is above such small and wicked things.

Mr. President, if there is a disgraceful chapter in American history it is in connection with this negotiation, by which it is undertaken by the Secretary of State to aid and assist the Democratic party by allying it with the Canadian party and the British party. It is fortunate for us that in a hundred years no such exhibition has been made heretofore, and it is to be hoped that it will not occur again. It was not intended that it should be known; there was nothing said about it, and if Mr. Tupper had not, in his innocence, mentioned the subject in the Canadian Parliamant, I suppose it would have escaped observation except in a general way. Those who believed this treaty was a surrender of American rights without equivalents might have believed that there were some reasons for it, I do not know what; I am unable to state.

I know that here is a treaty made by the present Administration which, if it had remained of the opinion that it was all through the year 1886 and through a good portion of the year 1887, it would not have sent to the Senate. I do not know what influences were brought to bear. I do not know whether it was supposed it would be popular with Great Britain and Canada and whether it would or would not assist in the coming election. I know that it is a treaty unfit to be made, and the transaction is one for which the Department and the whole country, so far as it has had any connection with it, ought to be ashamed.

Mr. Tupper told us that this was but the beginning, in substance that they could not carry this load all at once, but we were coming to the question of free fish and free intercourse between the United States and Great Britain.

The President told us in his message that he did not think it was worth while to pass upon that question in the treaty, but to make it contingent. Why, sir, the President of the United States knew that he could not modify or change the impost duty laws. He knew that the duty on fish was part of the law of the land. The Democratic House of Representatives referred that matter in the Forthy-eighth Congress to its Judiciary Committee, and its Judiciary Committee with one accord, without exception, both political parties concurring, reported that it was not in the power of the executive department to negotiate a treaty that should amend, modify, or change the import laws. But there was an understanding that the Democratic party should work in the House for this purpose, and they did so work.

I desire to submit some portions of Mr. Tupper's remarks upon this question, which have already been read in part, and, therefore, I will ask to put them in without reading:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to insult both the great political parties of this country who have since 1854 and long before maintained that the interests of Canada—the interests of British North America—were intimately bound up in obtaining free intercourse with the United States for our natural products—I do not intend to insult the two great parties in this country by telling them that they were fools, that they did not know what they were doing. Down to the present hour we have adopted the policy on both sides of the House, and we have pledged ourselves to the people to do everything that lay in our power to obtain a free market for the natural products of our country with the United State, and I say you must answer me the question as to whether that was an act of supreme folly, or whether it was wise statesmanship on the part of both parties in this country to adopt that policy, before you ask me such a question as "who pays the duty?"

I say that under this bill which has been introduced and which I believe will pass, for it does not require two-thirds of the Senate, where the Republican majority is only one in the whole House, to pass the bill, it requires a majority of one only, and I am very sanguine that this bill will pass during the present session. Modified it may be, but I am inclined to think the amendments will be still more in the interests of Canada than as the bill stands to-day. If this is the case I think we may congratulate ourselves upon securing the free admission of our lumber, upon which was paid during the last year no less than $1,315,450. On coppor-ore, made free by the Mills bill, we paid, or there was paid—to make it meet the views of the honorable gentlemen opposite more correctly—$96,945. On salt, $21,992 duty was paid. This is rendered free by the Mills bill. I am sorry to find, as I hoped would be the case, from the first copy of the bill that came to me, that potatoes were not included amongst vegetables. I am sorry to find there is a doubt as to whether the term "vegetables not specially enumerated" will not exclude potatoes.

In grappling with this policy of making the natural products of the two countries free, you do not expect any person who wants to carry a bill to put a heavier load upon his shoulders than he is able to carry, lest he may break down and do nothing. You expect him to take it in detail, and, as I believe, you will find the policy contained in this bill of making those natural products of Canada free, carried out until you have perfect freedom of intercourse between the natural products of Canada and the United States of America. Of wool we sent last year 1,319,309 pounds of one kind and a variety of other kinds, upon which a duty was paid to the extent of $183,852. Now, as I say on articles of prime importance and interest to Canada the removal of duty by the Mills bill amounts to no less than $1,890,193. You will be glad to hear that I do not intend to detain the house any longer. In discharge of the duties—the very onerous and important duties—of one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries at that conference, I have steadily kept in view what, in my heart and judgment, I believed were the best interests of Canada. In the measure which I have the honor to submit to this house I believe will be found embodied a bill which it is of the most vital importance to Canada to pass.

As it stands to-day the Government of the United States have only my signature to sustain the course that has been taken. I was not there as the representative of the Government of Canada, nor can my signature to the treaty necessarily imply the approval and support of even the Government of Canada. I occupied on that occasion the position of one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries, charged not only with the responsibility of what I owed to Canada, but also the responsibility of my duty to the empire. I can only say, sir, that I felt I would best discharge my duty to the empire by steadily keeping in view the interest of Canada. I believe, sir, that there is no way in which any public man in this country can promote the interests of the great empire of which we form a part, better, or as well, as by taking such a course of public action as will build up a great British community on this northern portion of the continent of America.

I believe, sir, that we owe it to the empire as well as to ourselves steadily to keep in view every measure that will conduce to the rapid progress of Canada, the development of our inexhaustible resources, and the building up of a great and powerful British dominion on this side of the Atlantic. I say, sir, that in the discharge of my duty I have steadily kept that conviction in view, and I believe the course which has been pursued will not only commend itself to the judgment and the support of the great majority in this house, but that the great majority of the people in this country will feel that in the adoption of this treaty we are taking a step that is calculated to conduce to the progress and greatness and best interests of Canada.

Mr. Tupper tells us that the whole Democratic party of the United States is in sympathy and accord with this view. It would look very much as if that was the fact. Democrats on this floor who last year took the position that there was no necessity for any further legislation, that there was no necessity for any further treaty, are now upbraiding us because we do not see the necessity of this treaty. They upbraid us because we do not approve of the provisions of this treaty. The Secretary of State, who had declared through his minister that it was not a question of a new treaty, but a question of the construction of the present treaty, says that it is a valuable treaty and one that ought to be ratified by the Senate.

I denied before that it was a construction of the treaty of 1818 and I declared then that it was a new treaty. I desire to read just a few words from a letter of Mr. Trescott, a prominent Democrat, upon that point. Mr. Trescott is well known in this country as an able diplomat, and passing upon this question he says:

There is not in this treaty an article, a phrase, a word, which recognizes our construction. It is absolutely rejected. The consequence is that this is a new treaty, not a construction of an old one. Whatever it may do for the future, it can not help the past, and thus the position taken by the country through Congress as to our reciprocal commercial rights and the protests by Mr. Bayard against those rights can find no support in any of its provisions, and our claims for compensation must either be abandoned or we must begin over again the angry and useless reclamations of the last two or three years. It is indeed a very curious fact that, although the necessity for any treaty sprang from the violent, persistent, and annoying seizures by the Canadian and Newfoundland authorities, there is not in the whole treaty a reference to these seizures or a suggestion of any right to or any method of compensation.

Mr. President, I have alluded to an interview of the Secretary of State. This interview purports to have been on the 11th of July of this year. I would not willingly do injustice to the Secretary of State, and I would not assume that any newspaper article expressed his views if there were not good reasons to suppose that such was the fact; but this publication in the Sun, of the city of Baltimore, has been before the country for some time, and I am not aware that the Secretary has ever in any manner indicated his disapproval of the sentiments put in his mouth and said to have been uttered by him.

The editor of this paper proceeds, before he reaches the interview, to castigate the Senate, undoubtedly upon information furnished him by the Secretary of State, and then he reaches a point where he says the Secretary was interviewed and made "the following statement." It is too long to read, and I propose, unless there is objection, to put the whole interview, including the comments of the newspaper, in my speech. I propose, if this article is not true, to put it in official form so that the Secretary of State may, if he desires, contradict it. He may think it beneath his dignity to deny a newspaper report, but it is a report so unjust to him if untrue, and so unjust to the Senate if true, that I do not think he can afford to overlook it. Therefore I will insert it in the RECORD:

THE FISHERIES DISCUSSION—MR. BAYARD REPLIES TO SENATOR HOAR—THE ADMINISTRATION JEALOUS OF THE RIGHTS OF AMERICAN SEAMEN, AND HAS MAINTAINED THEM.

[Special dispatch to the Baltimore Sun.]

WASHINGTON, July 11.

The elaborate production with which Mr. HOAR occupied the Senate yesterday afternoon bears the marks of most careful preparation. It is undeniably able and ingenious, although anything but ingenuous. It will be used as a campaign document, as will various of the speeches of other Republican Senators on the fisheries treaty. The crusade against the treaty inaugurated on the Republican side of the Senate is palpably dishonest. The evidences are thick that had it been negotiated by a Republican administration it would have been defended as solidly by them as it is now denounced.

Unbiased public sentiment in New England, according to all reliable reports, steadily tends to approve of its provisions. But with the desire and hope of making political capital and preventing a Democratic Administration from having the honor of reconciling international differences, which at one time threatened to lead to such serious results, the Senate Republicans have deliberately addressed themselves to the task of falsifying facts, perverting argument, and obstructing a settlement which they know in their hearts abates not one jot or tittle of American rights and American honor. If they were sincere in their denunciation of the treaty they would reject it outright, as they have the full power to do. To the contrary, the programme is said to be to exhaust all the vocabulary of vituperation and misrepresentation upon it, to be used as campaign literature, and then postpone its further consideration until December next. Should the Senate reject the treaty, there are good grounds for belief that the President would immediately put into execution the provisions of the retaliation act.

Although so much stress has been laid upon this act and the failure of the Executive to avail of it by Republican Senators and members from New England, it is the very last thing they want him to do, for it would injure New England ten times more than it would Canada. In all probability Senators FRYE and HOAR would be among the first to rush to the White House and beseech the President to withdraw his proclamation. A very striking illustration of honest sentiment in New England on the subject of the treaty is found in the action of the Democrats of Maine. Their nominee for governor is Mr. Putnam, one of the commissioners who negotiated it, and their platform indorses the treaty in length and breadth, without qualification or amendment. Mr. Putnam is making one of the most lively and animated canvasses that has ever occurred in the State of Maine, and wherever he speaks he makes the treaty a distinct issue. He writes here that there have never been larger or more enthusiastic meetings in the State.

Other Maine Democrats send word here that the Republican majority will be materially cut down, if not entirely wiped out. Perhaps these predictions may be regarded as too sanguine, but the fact of big Democratic meetings and intense public enthusiasm is quite sufficient proof that there is not a universal desire in Maine to crucify Cleveland and Bayard for surrendering everything to Canada, as Senator FRYE wants us to believe. Senator HOAR'S remarkable misstatement of facts will, of course, be replied to in due time by Senators on the other side. He seemed to take especial pleasure in attacking and misrepresenting the action of Secretary Bayard. In view of the important questions involved and the public interest the comments of the Secretary on Mr. HOAR'S speech will be eagerly read. In conversation with your correspondent on the subject to-day Mr. Bayard said:

"It is hardly worth the trouble to deny the utterances of men who willfully pervert the truth to suit their own purposes.

"The remarks of Senator HOAR are disengenuous in the extreme; the speech is a hysterical scream from beginning to end. His statements are most untrue, most unfair. He makes charges which he must know to be without foundation, as the full records concerning them are in the archives of the Senate in the form of executive documents. His discourse is more barren of fairness and honesty than any document I have known, which consumed three weeks in the preparation, and supposed to be the result of research for the truth only. It is not to be wondered that we failed to consult with the New England Senators as to the nature of the negotiations with the British and Canadian protocolists. We hardly seek roses where thorns only abide, nor do we go to enemies for friendly advice. Mr. INGALLS on one occasion asked whether it should be blood or negotiation. Mr. EDMUNDS replied, 'Neither.' These men were sworn to defeat any attempt to settle existing difficulty. Evidently their purpose was, and is, to embarrass the Administration. Was it to such men that we should turn for friendly counsel?

"Mr. HOAR avers that this Department declined to furnish the Senate, in response to resolution calling therefor, the proposal and counter proposals made while the joint commission was in session. This is absolutely untrue. As is usual in such cases it was agreed that the proceedings of the commission should be regarded as of a strictly confidential nature. The meetings were to be of a purely informal character, and when it was deemed advisable to publish any of the conclusions reached or proposals made, it was not to be done until the written statement had been signed by all the protocolists. I have already answered this charge. My statement is printed in Executive Document 127, published by the Senate March 26, 1888, it being an answer to a Senate resolution calling for the transmission of copies of the minutes and daily protocols of the meeting of the commissioners who negotiated the treaty with Great Britain.

"In that letter I stated: 'In conformity with the invariable course pursued in previous negotiations when the conference met it was agreed that an honorable confidence should be maintained in its deliberations, and that only results should be announced, and such other matters as the joint protocolists should sign under the direction of the plenipotentiaries. With this understanding, which was strictly kept, the discussions of the conference proceeded, through its numerous and prolonged sessions, with that freedo and uniformity in the exchange of views which the nature of the negotiation required, and without which its progress would have been materially hampered and any agreement rendered very difficult of attainment. No stenographer was employed, and no minutes or daily protocols were agreed upon and signed by the joint protcolists other than those already transmitted to the Senate.

"'Upon the conclusion of the treaty some members of the conference at once left the city under the pressure of other duties, and it is thus probable that some statements were excluded that otherwise might have been placed in the joint protocols. After the conference had finally adjourned and Sir Charles Tupper had returned to Ottawa a request was received through the British minister that assent be given to the publication of a certain proposal which had been submitted by the British plenipotentiaries and declined by the American. I inclose a copy of the papers referred to, and they were printed in the executive document. These were at the disposal of Senator HOAR, and prove his charge to have been utterly unfounded. I will explain to you the reasons which led me to grant the permission to print the proposal made by Sir Charles Tupper, which is as follows:

"'That with the view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fisheries articles of the Washington treaty, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland.'

"This proposition was declined because it necessitated an adjustment of the present tariff of the United States by Congressional action, which adjustment was considered to be manifestly impracticable of accomplishment through the form of treaty under the circumstances then existing.

"'Sir Charles Tupper was greatly interested in the acceptance of this proposal, which had for its object the abolishment of the duty on fish and fish oil. His government greatly desired that an arrangement to this end should be made. Therefore, when Sir Charles Tupper returned home, he was confronted with the demand, 'Where is the free fish and free fish oil you promised to obtain for us?' 'I did not succeed,' he was obliged to answer, 'but I made the effort.' To prove that he had endeavored to accomplish that which the people so greatly desired he asked for permission to print his proposal and our declination. It was but fair to grant the request, and it was granted. These facts were known to Mr. HOAR, or could have been learned with no trouble whatever.

"It is true that I made no attempt to secure the right to fish in the jurisdictional waters of Canada. To obtain this concession it was required that we accede to the demand of the Canadian Government that its fish and fish-oil be allowed to enter into our ports free of duty. I for one did not propose to accede to any demand. We determined to obtain our rights, nothing more, and it has cost the United States nothing to do so. What a contrast to the result of the Halifax commission which met in 1871, and of which Senator HOAR'S brother was a member. On that occasion the American protocolists paid for the privilege of fishing within the 3-mile limit for twelve years $5,000,000 and abolished the duty on fish and fish-oil. Previous to the meeting of the commission a British fleet had seized a number of American vessels, but no redress was obtained or even demanded. The ratification of this treaty was agreed upon by a Republican Senate. The charming consistency of Senator HOAR is here apparent. While at one time he favored free fish and free oil, when he learned that negotiations were to be entered into concerning the fisheries he introduced the following resolution in the Senate, February 24, 1887:

"'Resolved, That it is the judgment of the Senate that under present circumstances no negotiation should be undertaken with Great Britain in regard to existing difficulties with her province of Canada which has for its object the reduction, change, or abolition of any of our existing duties on imports.'

"Now the Senator censures the Department for failing to obtain the concession, which he knew depended upon the abolition of the duty on fish and fish-oil. It was a most impudent resolution, as well as inconsistent, for the President was at liberty to enter into any negotiation he saw fit. As a matter of fact, no sane man would give $50,000 a year for the privilege of fishing within the 3-mile limit, notwithstanding the enormous sum paid for the concession by the commission of 1871. I did not consult with the New England Senators, but I did hear the opinions on this point of men known to be thoroughly conversant with the subject. Professor Baird told me that the men I had here in connection with the 3-mile limit question knew more about the fishery question than any one else in New England. They told me the privilege was valueless. Moreover, there is a report which Mr. HOAR might have read coming from a committee of Republican Senators, which also avows the privilege to be of no value. I therefore had the best of information and advice as to the worth of the concession which once cost $5,500,000.

"It is not true that the State Department does not press claims for damages. The case referred to by Mr. HOAR is that which was covered by the following paragraph of my letter to the Senate published in Executive Document No. 127, March 26, 1888: 'Every point submitted to the conference is covered by the paper now in possession of the Senate, excepting the question of damages sustained by our fishermen, which, being met by the counter claim for damages to British vessels in Bering Sea, was left for future settlement.' This was determined the best course that could be pursued by the commission. As their claim exceeded ours I was very willing to agree to this. Senator HOAR also refers to the case of the Bridgewater. Within two days after the case was reported to this Department the claim for damages presented by the owners of the vessel was on its way to England.

"The British Government is now investigating the case. Again he charges that I allowed the flag of an American vessel to be hauled down by the officers of a British cruiser. For that act this country received a full apology from England. As much can not be said when indignities were heaped upon American seamen in years gone by. The Administration is jealous of the rights of American seamen and has maintained them. There was more trouble of this character during General Grant's administrations than there has been in Mr. Cleveland's.

"No provision was inserted in the treaty to prevent the ordering off of American vessels from the jurisdictional waters of Canada, because the surrendering of the headland right by the British plenipotentiaries rendered such provision unnecessary. Imagine a line drawn from one headland of Prince Edward's Island to the other. It would be about 100 miles long. It would inclose at the farthest point from shore about 50 miles of water. Under the old rights the Canadian Government could order beyond that line any American vessel that happened to get within it. This right has been surrendered. For this reason it was not necessary to provide against the ordering off of vessels.

"Senator HOAR did not read Sir Charles Tupper's statement with the proper knowledge of the meaning of English words or he would not have made the rash statement that that gentleman said I made promises for the President, House of Representatives, and Democratic party as to what would be done for Great Britain and Canada. Sir Charles's speech contains no such statement. I did tell Sir Charles Tupper that when Canada treated American citizens fairly he might then expect some steps looking to the establishment of more friendly relations between the two countries.

"For my own part I favor reciprocity with Canada. The existing conditions are absurd. We pay Canada for our coal and we pay her for hers. A duty is paid us on Canadian fish and we have to pay Canada a duty on our fish. It is manifestly wrong. Reciprocity has been favored by such men as Webster, Marcy, Everett, Arthur, Frelinghuysen, and many others. Some of the Republicans go so far as to favor commercial union.

"There is one statement I wish to make particularly emphatic, and that is, the American fishermen have under the treaty every right of value to them, and the Government has been put to no expense thereby. Their interests will be guarded and no attempt to deprive them of their rights tolerated. It is my hope that all trouble will be ended by the establishment of full reciprocity between Canada and the United States. I had hoped, as a step toward this end, free fish and free oil would have been one of the provisions of the Mills bill, and trust that it may yet be inserted."—Baltimore Sun, July 12, 1888.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] the other day introduced in the Senate a letter from Hon. Charles Levi Woodbury concerning this matter, which is such high authority on this subject that I am inclined to add it also to the letters that appear upon this question. The Senator from New Hampshire explained to the Senate and to the country who Charles Levi Woodbury was and who he is. I suppose there are few men in the country, if there are any, who are as well qualified to speak on this subject as Mr. Woodbury; probably no one unless it be Mr. Trescott, who is also a Democratic diplomat and who has spoken in the same general direction that Mr. Woodbury has. So when Mr. Tupper says the entire Democratic party of the country are in accord with the ideas of this treaty he is mistaken. That is not the fact.

The letter of Mr. Woodbury is as follows:

To the Editor of the Sun:

SIR: The Chamberlain treaty is now before the Senate. It surrenders everything the United States have contended for since 1838, when the dispute on the 3-mile limit began, contentions which the British authorities have assented to or temporized about as often as pressed, so that really in no entire year since then have they insisted on enforcing their headland theory.

The commercial rights of the United States under the agreements of 1830 were utterly abandoned by Mr. Bayard after much previous insistence on their obligation.

The rights of common humanity toward our vessels in distress, accorded everywhere except on the Canadian coast, are hereafter to be allowed only upon the condition that the United States shall change its present registry laws by repealing them, and enacting such new ones as are acceptable to the British Government before going into effect. This of course leaves the humanity of Canada to vessels of the United States in distress withheld until the United States shall pay the consideration by repealing its laws and making such new ones.

Commercial intercourse by our fishing vessels is disallowed, but they may be permitted to buy a narrow line of supplies, whose extent would not exceed $50,000 a year, when the United States shall have repealed existing duties, now over $611,000 a year, on Canadian fish and oil, and made them free in our markets.

This is the substance of the treaty, all losses to the United States both in honor and profit. General Jackson and Mr. McLane, Van Buren and Forsyth, Stevenson and Everett, Webster, Rush, Grant, Evarts, and even Bayard and Phelps, for two of their official years, are buried beneath this treaty and their memories dishonored by its retreat from their patriotic contentions for American rights.

Cavilers have said the treaty of 1818 was wrung from our weakness, but this treaty, made in the hour of our strength, surrenders what that never did—our markets; and it doubles the waters from which it requires we shall be forever excluded.

The consequence of adopting this treaty would be the destruction of the fishery under the American flag, the paralysis of our hope of naval power, and a British monopoly of our markets, aggrandizing its dangerous naval power. Let the treaty be rejected.

CHARLES LEVI WOODBURY.

BOSTON, May 4, 1888.

Mr. President, there are some provisions of this treaty the details of which I should like to have gone into more extensively, and there are several things in connection with the history of the transactions of early times that I should like to refer to if I had not already detained the Senate to an unusual length on this subject. Suffice it to say that it is one that the American people have interest in; it is one that the American people do not consider a local question; it is one, as was said by more than one member of the House of Representatives in 1887, that does not concern a few fish. It is not a local controversy, said they; it is not a skirmish about fish, said two members at least, one of whom is now an honored member of this body; it is not a question of property, but a question of honor, of dignity, and of right, and a question whether we are to surrender for the purpose of escaping a threat of war or to escape evils of any other kind.

Mr. President, we were told here and we have been told elsewhere, that the President of the United States would put in force the act of 1887; that he would put it in force in such a way, we have been told in substance, as to disturb and destroy the business of the country; that we had armed him with a power which was very dangerous. Why, sir, if the President of the United States chooses to disturb business for the purpose of compelling decent treatment to our seamen on the northern seas, very well, let him do it.

If any other method can be devised by which the seamen may be protected in their rights, let him put us in a position of complete noncommercial intercourse, and the people of the United States will not complain. If the exclusion of fresh fish from Canada will do it, the people will not justify him in going beyond that. He can not by way of punishment to the Senate disturb the business of the country, and the Senate will not be influenced by any suggestions of newspapers, whether they get their ideas from the Secretary of State, as the Baltimore Sun seems to have done, or from anywhere else, that the business of the country is to be disturbed if we do not accept this treaty.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] said it is foredoomed to defeat. Undoubtedly, and it is foredoomed to defeat at this session, I want to say to the Senator; and if the President of the United States declines to put in force in any proper manner the statute that we enacted for that purpose, he must take the responsibility if disturbances arise, and not we. We can not be moved by threats of disturbed business any more than we can by the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] that this might lead to war, that commercial war was close on to real war. When the act of 1887 was before the Senate, the Senator from Alabama said it does not mean war, it means peace. Now, we are told that it may mean war. Who has the right to threaten the American Senate with war? Who makes war? Certainly nobody in the Senate individually and nobody in the executive department is likely to make war. Great Britain is not likely to go to war with us for that which she has absolutely abandoned and surrendered and for that which she has never vigorously enforced at any time in the history of this claim by the Canadian authorities.

Great Britain does not go to war without cause, unless she knows that she has it in her power to acquire great good to herself by so doing. It is simply absurd to talk about a war with Great Britain; it is folly. But we are as ready for war as Great Britain. We may not have as many guns, but we would have means for maintaining the honor and the dignity of the American people in a war with Great Britain or with any other country, and we will not surrender one jot or one tittle of that which belongs to us for fear of war, nor under covert threats that if we do not accept this treaty something will follow it that will be worse and the business of the country will be disturbed. We can say for ourselves on this side of the Chamber that we approach this question with as much patriotism as Senators on the other side, and we can point to the fact that until recently the legislative department of the Government and the executive department of the Government were in perfect harmony with us upon this question.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I give way for that purpose, with the understanding that I may have the floor upon the treaty when its consideration is resumed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] is recognized, and will be entitled to the floor when the consideration of the treaty is next resumed.

If there be no objection, the open executive session will stand adjourned and the Senate resumes the consideration of legislative business.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. VEST. I report, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, a bill as a substitute for the one called up this morning by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL] in regard to a public building at Chicago. I have drawn a bill which I think has the necessary limitation.

The bill (S. 3365) for the erection of a public building in the city of Chicago, Ill., to be used as an appraiser's warehouse and other public purposes, was read the first time by its title.

Mr. FARWELL. I ask for the present consideration of the bill. It is a substitute for the one that was passed this morning and afterwards reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator desires to have the bill just reported passed and the other bill indefinitely postponed, the Chair presumes.

Mr. VEST. Yes, I was going to suggest that that be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The bill was read a second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of erecting a public building upon the lot of ground, owned by the United States of America, on the corner of Harrison and Sherman streets, in the city of Chicago, Ill., said building to be used as an appraiser's warehouse and for other Government purposes. Said building shall be constructed upon plans and specifications to be furnished by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the said building shall be protected from danger by fire by having an open space on every side of at least 40 feet, including streets and alleys: Provided, That no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended until the State of Illinois shall cede to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. 1465) for the erection of a public building in the city of Chicago, Ill., will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 9396) for the relief of General William F. Smith; and

A bill (H. R. 2579) authorizing the President to appoint and retire Andrew J. Smith, late colonel of the Seventh United States Cavalry and a major-general of volunteers.

JOSEPH WIRTH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2033) granting a pension to Joseph Wirth; which was, at the end of line 6, to add:

In lieu of the pension now received by him.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Joseph Wirth, late quartermaster-sergeant in Company L, Third New Jersey Cavalry, and pay him at the rate of $30 per month, from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MAJ. GEN. W. W. AVERELL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1650) for the relief of Maj. Gen. W. W. Averell, which was, in line 19, after the word "act," to strike out all down to and including the word "decease," in line 22, as follows:

But this proviso shall be no bar to any claims for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of the said William W. Averell may have after his decease.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, before and during the late war, and of severe wounds received by him in battle, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William W. Averell, brevet major-general United States Army and late brigadier-general United States Volunteers, to the position of captain in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said William W. Averell, nor shall any compensation be paid to him for any period prior to his appointment under this act.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

MERCY A. CUTTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 888) granting a pension to Mercy A. Cutts, which were, in line 2, after the word "pension-roll," to strike out "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws;" in line 4, before the word "mother," to insert "foster;" and in line 5, after the word "volunteers," to insert "and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mercy A. Cutts, foster mother of Enoch F. Cutts, deceased, late of Company A, Thirty-first Maine Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES HALE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 734) granting a pension to James Hale, which was, at the end of the bill, to add "and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that which he is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James Hale, Company F, First New Hampshire Heavy Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSIDERATION OF BRIDGE BILLS.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent was given that at the conclusion of the observations of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and the resumption of legislative business, the consideration of bridge bills on the Calendar should be proceeded with. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before the motion is put, I hope unanimous consent may be given for the consideration of the bridge bills on some future day. As I suggested this afternoon, it is of very great importance that these bridge bills should be passed soon. They are nearly all House bills, and the work upon the structures should be commenced during this session.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senate desires to go on with these bills at this time, I shall withdraw the motion to adjourn; but I have been in my seat since 12 o'clock, and paying attention to the speech which has been delivered by the Senator from Colorado, and I should like myself to be permitted to leave.

Mr. MANDERSON. The bills are in charge of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. As far as I am concerned, I feel like acting in accordance with his wishes in regard to the matter whether we should go on with them now or postpone them until another day.

Mr. VEST. The bridge bills ought to be disposed of. I have not any special charge over them. I simply reported them from the Committee on Commerce. I am ready to take them up at any time.

Mr. PLATT. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

Mr. FRYE. There is no division of opinion about the bridge bills. They only have to be read to secure prompt action.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is all. I think we can dispose of them in an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. VEST. I have no special interest in these bills, but I should like to clean off the Calendar. I receive letters every day in regard to them, but I have no bills in which I am specially interested.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bridge bills may be taken up under the eighth rule at the close of the morning business on Monday next, and that their consideration be continued until 2 o'clock.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to that. Let us stay here and finish them this evening.

Mr. FRYE. We may just as well do it this afternoon.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope we shall.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE BETWEEN IOWA AND NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pursuant to the unanimous consent hitherto given, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeds to the consideration of Order of Business No. 1650, the title of which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7776) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, in the county of Monona, in the State of Iowa, and in the county of Burt, State of Nebraska, and to make the same a post-route.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorandum upon the Calendar before the Chair indicates that the Senator from Iowa desires that this bill may be passed over. Is there objection?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is a bill in which I am concerned, but the Senator from Iowa intimated to me that, if present, he would object to its consideration. In view of that fact I do not press its present consideration, but I ask that it be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT PONCA, NEBR.

The bill (H. R. 2625) authorizing the erection of a bridge across the Missouri River at Ponca, Nebr., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill appears to be reported adversely with a memorandum that the chairman of the committee consents to it with an amendment.

Mr. VEST. The difficulty about that bill was that there was no corporation named in it, but merely an association of individuals.

Mr. MANDERSON. Since the adverse report the individuals named have incorporated under the laws of the State of Nebraska, and the amendment, which I will offer, proposes to put in the name of the corporation instead of the names of the individuals.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to insert the amendment which I send to the desk, commencing after the word "for," in line 3.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3, after the word "for," it is proposed to strike out "John Stough, F. M. Dorsey, Baily Davenport, S. K. Bittenbender, J. W. Radford, J. G. Massie, and D. P. Sherwood, their executors, administrators, and," and insert "the Nebraska and Dakota Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Nebraska, or its successors or;" so as to read:

That it shall be lawful for the Nebraska and Dakota Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Nebraska, or its successors or assigns, to construct, under and subject to the conditions and limitations hereinafter provided, a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Ponca City, Nebr.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. In line 25, of section 1, after the word "that," I move to strike out the word "Congress," and insert "the Secretary of War;" so as to read:

Provided, That the Secretary of War may at any time prescribe such rules, regulations, and rates of toll for transit and transportation over said bridge as may be deemed proper and reasonable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. In section 3, line 2, after the word "time," I move to strike out the words "substantially and materially;" so as to read:

That no bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time obstruct the free navigation of said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. VEST. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 23, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 21, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OFFICERS DURING MEXICAN WAR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution calling for information relative to officers who served in the Mexican war and whose names have been dropped from the pension-rolls.

The SPEAKER. This communication will be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LEE. I would ask that this reply of the Secretary of the Interior be laid on the Speaker's table for the present.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

PACIFIC RAILROAD AND TELEGRAPH LINE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1426) supplementary to the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and also of the act of July 2, 1864, and other acts amendatory of said first-named act; with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and to agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the House, Mr. DOCKERY, Mr. ANDERSON, of Mississippi, and Mr. PETERS.

ADDITIONAL JUSTICES SUPREME COURT, DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10573) to provide for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes; with Senate amendments thereto.

Mr. GIFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to non-concur in the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that will be done.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of the conference on the part of the House, Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. KILGORE, and Mr. WARNER.

SHOSHONE AND BANNACK INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 8662) to accept and ratify an agreement made with the Shoshone and Bannack Indians for the surrender and relinquishment to the United States of a portion of the Fort Hall reservation in the Territory of Idaho, for the purposes of a town site, and for the grant of a right of way through said reservation to the Utah and Northern Railway Company, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5870) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape, murder, etc., with Senate amendments thereto; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SENATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following Senate bills, which were severally read a first and second time and referred as indicated:

The bill (S. 82) for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry S. French—to the Committee on War Claims.

There was no objection, and leave was granted.

Leave was granted the Select Committee to Inquire into the Enforcement of the Immigration Laws to have printed for the use of the committee 100 copies of portions of treaties with foreign powers, the laws of the United States relating to immigration, and the rules of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the enforcement of such laws.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Senate resolution No. 59, authorizing Brig. Gen. Absalom Baird to accept from the French Republic a diploma, etc., was improperly referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It should have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and if there be no objection, that reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. A communication from the Secretary of the Treasury was laid before the House yesterday morning transmitting a report from the Director of the Mint, and was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. At the same time a resolution to print the report was referred to the Committee on Printing. The Chair thinks that the report itself should also go to the Committee on Printing in order that it may be examined by the committee.

Mr. BLAND. I think it belongs there.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the opinions of the members of the Court of Claims on French spoliations.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The opinions are as follows:

COURT OF CLAIMS. FRENCH SPOLIATIONS. OPINIONS OF THE COURT DELIVERED MAY 17 AND MAY 24, 1886, BY JUDGE JOHN DAVIS.

William Gray, administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate not already administered of William Gray, deceased, testate, vs. The United States.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This claim is one of the class popularly called "French spoliations," and springs from the policy of the French revolutionary government between the execution of King Louis XVI and the year 1801, a policy which led to the detention, seizure, condemnation, and confiscation of our merchant vessels peacefully pursuing legitimate voyages upon the high seas. Over ninety years have these claims been the subject of discussion and agitation, first between the two nations, and then between the individuals injured and the Government of the United States. Prolonged and heated negotiation resulted in the treaty of 1800, by which it is urged on behalf of the claimants, their rights were surrendered to France for a consideration valuable to this Government. Their claims being valid obligations admitted by the French Government, they contend that the United States through this agreement, in which demands of the one nation were set off against those of the other, assumed as against their citizens these obligations and should pay them. This position is denied by the Government, which in addition presents other defenses based upon subsequent transactions between the two countries, urging that thereby were destroyed any beneficial rights possibly vested in the claimants, if their contention as to the treaty of 1800 be correct.

THE ACT OF JANUARY 20, 1885.

The act sending the claims to this court, while the third that has passed both Houses of Congress, is the first that has received the approval of a President, as one was vetoed by President Polk, another by President Pierce, while this, the third, was signed by President Arthur.

Whatever the rights of the claimants they are without remedy other than that which Congress may have seen fit to give them; and our power to grant redress, be our opinion as to the justice of their claims what it may, is limited by the terms of the remedial statute. The force and effect of the act, by virtue of which the claimants appear at this bar seeking relief, must then be examined at the threshold of the discussion.

The act authorizes "citizens of the United States or their legal representatives," having "valid claims to indemnity upon the French Government arising out of illegal captures, detentions, seizures, condemnations, and confiscations," prior to the ratification of the convention of 1800 with France, to apply here within a time limited (section 1), that (section 3) this court may "examine and determine the validity and amount" of their claims, the present ownership, and, if owned by an assignee, certain details in regard thereto. The act excludes from its benefits claims embraced in certain conventions with France and Spain, concluded in 1803, 1819, and 1831, and with provisions as to rules of court, defense of the United States, evidence, and other matters not important for our immediate purpose, directs this court, as to the claims thus placed within our jurisdiction, to report to Congress the first Monday of each December the facts found by us and our conclusions, which are to be taken, both as to law and facts, as advisory and not conclusive upon either party, the claimants or the Government.

So peculiar a jurisdiction was probably never before conferred upon a strictly judicial tribunal. The rights of the claimants, if any exist, arise from the acts of the political branch of the Government done in the protection and aid of the nation. For such rights there can be no remedy other than that granted by the legislature; in this instance the legislature has elected to transmit to the judiciary, under certain restrictions, the examination of the claimant's demands, with the proviso that the conclusion reached in this forum shall not be finally binding upon either party, but that the defendants, as well as the claimants, have reserved to them an appeal, not in the regular line of judicial procedure to the Supreme Court of the United States, but back again to that body from which alone any remedy can come to the citizen from wrongs done him by his Government.

The reason for this peculiar grant of remedy is found in the nature of the claims which spring from international controversies of the gravest character intimately entwined with the history of our struggle for independence; also in the age of the claims; and, lastly, in the absolutely indeterminate amount of financial responsibility which will be thrown upon the Government should the claims be found to exist as valid obligations due from the United States to their citizens. Good or bad, not one of these claims is enforceable but by the consent of Congress, and the Congress can affix to that consent such condition as in their wisdom seems just and for the best interests of the Republic. The remedy now granted is an examination and advisory report by the judiciary, to be followed by a decision by the legislative branch of the Government.

It has been said that the validity of the claims as a class is admitted by the act, and this court should confine the examination to each individual claim for the purpose only of determining whether it falls within the class. This is understood to be in effect the argument on behalf of some of the claimants. Our labor and responsibility would be greatly lightened could we agree with this proposition, but the act of Congress seems clearly to negative the contention, and to throw upon us the duty of investigating the validity of these claims against France and the assumption of them by the United States. It requires us to examine, not claims in a specified category or known by a generic name, not even "claims" simply, but "valid" claims against France, and valid claims arising not merely from captures, detentions, seizures, condemnations, and confiscations, but from acts of this nature which were "illegal." The validity of the claims, as against France, is the very first condition imposed by the legislature upon the grant of remedy.

The claims must have been "valid" obligations existing at the time, and which this Government had the right to enforce diplomatically before they come within the purport of the statute. To grant as correct the contention that we are to examine in each case whether, and only whether, the seized or detained vessel had violated the law of nations or the treaties—as, for illustration, drawn from the argument, whether she carried contraband of war, or attempted to break an actual blockade, or failed to carry proper papers—if we are to examine only into this, then effect is perhaps given to the word "illegal," found in the statute defining the nature of the acts from which the claims arise, but the word "valid," of equal if not superior force, is entirely ignored.

Clearly Congress expects from us an opinion as to the validity of claims of this class as against France, and the third section of the act, which requires us to receive "historic and documentary evidence," "to decide upon the validity of said claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same," and to report "all such conclusions of fact and law as in [our] judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor," is not only confirmatory of this conclusion, but obliges us to go farther and to examine into the resultant liability claimed to exist in the Government of the United States to compensate the claimants for the injuries alleged to have been sustained at the hands of the French Republic. This involves an examination of the history of the relations between the two countries from 1777, when negotiations for the treaties of alliance and commerce began, as the whole contention starts with the treaties of 1778 with France, which came to us during the darkest hours of the struggle for independence, and when we were hoping against hope for the aid which there was no prospect of receiving.

TREATIES OF 1778.

Burgoyne had capitulated, Howe had been driven from New Jersey, and, after the drawn battle of Germantown, was shut up in Philadelphia, where the ease and luxury of a city camp were but occasionally interrupted by an excursion against the enemy on land or an encounter upon the river. Curiously enough, at the end of a successful campaign, the American cause was, barring the indomitable spirit of the patriots, in the direst straits.

Gates, excited by his success at the North and become the president of the executive board of war, had broken with Washington, and had used his influence successfully in securing the appointment as inspector-general, against Washington's earnest protest, of a man who had openly defied the commander-in-chief. Washington's army of less than nine thousand men lying at Valley Forge was violently assailed by the State of Pennsylvania for not prosecuting an active winter campaign, while even in Congress, to which the remonstrance of the State's council and assembly had been addressed, there was deep discontent as to the policy of the commander-in-chief and sharp criticism upon his conduct. In Philadelphia the British, lodged in comfortable houses, were surrounded by every luxury which a full purse and communication with the outer world could afford, while in the Continental camp, as Washington wrote to Congress, the army was so reduced by cold and starvation that unless some capital change took place it must "starve, dissolve, or disperse."

In Philadelphia there was every comfort and almost every means of dissipation; at Valley Forge nearly three thousand men were unfit for duty because they were barefooted "and otherwise naked" (Sparks's Washington, volume 5, page 197–203), while many were in the hospitals and farm-houses wanting clothes and shoes (ibid.). So desperate was the situation that General Huntington preferred fighting to starving, his brigade being out of provisions, while General Varnum, quoting the saying of Solomon that "hunger will break through a stone wall," added "three days successively we have been destitute of bread; two days we have been entirely without meat. The men must be supplied or they can not be commanded." (Ibid., page 193.)

This condition of his severely-tried army Washington represented to Congress eloquently and repeatedly; practically that body did nothing to remedy the evil, but on the other hand suggested the propriety of attacking Philadelphia, while an expedition of 1,000 men was, against Washington's judgment, detached for an invasion of Canada; an expedition abundantly supplied with commanders in the persons of three major-generals, but unfortunately lacking in such necessary military details as food, clothing, and transportation (Bancroft, volume 9, chapter 27). The financial condition of the country was in harmony with the physical condition of the army, and the issue of eight and one-half millions of paper money caused an enormous depreciation in the value of the currency, increased the feeling of financial insecurity, and necessarily impaired the credit of the Government. The army was small, insufficiently fed, paid, and clad; before them was a strong, rich, and prosperous enemy; the Government was weak, the currency suspected, while disaffection, discontent, and jealousy were prevalent among the highest officers.

Such was the close of the year 1777 at home. Hardy, determined, patriotic, self-sacrificing as the sturdy revolutionists were, probably some way would have been found out of these apparently overwhelming misfortunes: how, no one at that time could possibly foresee. Relief was, however, after weary waiting, to come from a quarter where it had long been expected with hope constantly deferred.

Franklin had early established indirect and secret relations with the court of France through his friend Dumas, a Swiss man of letters residing chiefly in Holland, who was a devoted adherent of the American cause, and who early advised an alliance with France and Spain, it being to their interest that the United States should be independent of England, "whose enormous maritime power [filled] them with apprehensions." In 1776 Silas Deane was sent out as a political agent, and he soon opened secret and informal relations with the French department of foreign affairs. He could not succeed in obtaining from France any open action, but his purchase of munitions of war and supplies, and his many other acts in direct violation of strict neutrality were permitted, winked at, and encouraged. He was told that it was for the interest of both countries "to have the most free and uninterrupted intercourse," but that, the understanding with Britain being good, there could not be recognition of the shipping of military supplies and stores.

Practically in this condition did matters remain after the arrival of the commissioners, Franklin and Lee, although they also constantly pressed the argument contained in the instructions to Deane, namely, France is the country it is fittest for us to obtain and cultivate; the commercial advantages Britain has enjoyed with the colonies have greatly contributed to her wealth and importance; a great part of that commerce will fall to France, especially, and (here is the key of the negotiation) if she favors us now, for our trade is rapidly increasing, our population is rapidly increasing, we are waxing strong and rich, with a great future before us, why not step in now, even at the cost of war with England, a war which under any circumstances you momentarily expect?

French popular sentiment was with us, but to the popular clamor, delicately excited by the astute diplomacy of Franklin and his colleagues, was opposed the clear and calm judgment of the King's advisers, men who conceived it their duty to obtain for their master every advantage possible from the struggling colonies at the least possible expense and risk. Supplies and stores were furnished but the assistance was not acknowledged; munitions of war found their way across the Atlantic while the fact was denied to England, and, although some of these very supplies came from the arsenals of the Government, that fact even was denied to our own representatives who had forwarded them, and who, as a matter of course, knew as much of the transaction as the minister who permitted and disavowed it. Day after day without tiring did Dumas, Deane, Franklin, and Lee press for open action on the part of France. Steadily did they receive promises and secret aid, but always were they postponed as to the great step which should produce France openly to the world as the ally of the colonies and the avowed enemy of England. Before the eyes of Count Vergennes was successfully dangled the bait of a practically exclusive share in American commerce, but still he hoped to secure this advantage without an open rupture with England.

In this condition did matters rest until the news arrived of Burgoyne's defeat. This news, which reached France early in December, 1777, "apparently occasioned as much general joy as if it had been a victory of their own troops over their own enemies." (The commissioners to Committee on Foreign Affairs, Paris, December 18, 1777.) The negotiations instantly took so long a stride forward that before the 18th of December it was decided to conclude a treaty of amity and commerce, the King becoming fixed in his determination to acknowledge and support the independence of the colonies by every means in his power. Nothing could be more generous and liberal than the whole tone and manner of the French negotiations from this time. Once decided and committed as to the policy of openly supporting the colonies, there were no half-spirited measures, no halting at petty details, no discussion of unimportant trifles, but a generous and open support; nevertheless, it was not until Gates's victory at Saratoga had seemed to turn the tide of events, and while still in ignorance of the want and suffering at Valley Forge, that this action so vital to the future of the American Republic was taken. The war for independence was with the assistance of France prosecuted to a successful issue, and at Yorktown the surrender of Cornwallis was made to the combined armies of Washington and Rochambeau under the guns of the fleet of De Grasse.

This brief view of the situation, rehearsing as it does details of most familiar history, is only of importance as it relates to what may be called sentimental points made in the argument. The treaties of 1778 were made in obedience to a popular demand in France; they were made for a consideration then deemed valuable by France, and at a moment which then seemed opportune to France; but they came to us when the tide was apparently turning against us and the aid they promised was generously given us.

The 30th day of November, 1782, provisional articles of peace acknowledging the thirteen former colonies "to be free and independent" were signed at Paris by the representatives of the United States and Great Britain; the 20th of January, 1783, a cessation of hostilities was declared, and the 3d of September, 1783, the definitive treaty of peace was concluded. France had thus given the major portion of the consideration offered by her for the contract of 1778, and the United States were free, sovereign, and independent, as she had stipulated they should be.

The treaties of 1778 were two in number, that of "alliance," the one of the most immediate, and, in fact, at the time, of absolutely vital importance to the United States; and that of "amity and commerce." While separate instruments, they were concluded upon the same day, were the result of the same negotiation, signed by the same plenipotentiaries, and are, in diplomatic effect, one instrument. The treaty of alliance, after referring to its companion, the treaty of commerce, states that the two powers "have thought it necessary to take into consideration the means of strengthening the engagements therein made," and of "rendering them useful to the safety and tranquillity of the two parties; particularly in case Great Britain, in resentment of that connection, * * * should break the peace with France, either by direct hostilities or by hindering her commerce and navigation in a manner contrary to the rights of nations and the peace subsisting between the two crowns;" and the two powers resolving in such case to join against the common enemy determined upon the treaty, which provided that if war should break out between France and Great Britain during the war for American independence, each party should aid the other, according to the exigencies, as good and faithful allies; that the essential end of the alliance, called a "defensive" alliance, was the "liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, of the United States."

Provision was also made for a possible conquest of Canada, Bermuda, and the islands in the Gulf of Mexico, and each party was forbidden to conclude a truce or peace with Great Britain without the consent of the other. It was further agreed that neither should lay down arms until the independence of the United States was assured by treaties terminating the war. No claim was to be made by one against the other for compensation, whatever the result, and then came the guaranty, out of which afterwards arose so serious complications, national and international, which not only drove our country, weak and exhausted from seven years' strife, to the verge of war, but also stirred up at home a bitter political contest, carried even into the intimacy of a President's Cabinet.

These stipulations are contained in the eleventh and twelfth articles, whereby each party guarantied "forever against all other powers"—first, the United States to France: all the possessions of France in America as well as those it might acquire by any future treaty of peace; second, France to the United States: "their liberty, sovereignty, and independence absolute and unlimited," together with their possessions and their additions or conquests made from Great Britain during the war. Such, in substance, was the treaty of alliance; it has never been contended, so far as known to us, that France did not fulfill the requirements which this instrument imposed upon her during our contest with Great Britain.

The provisions of the other agreement, the treaty of commerce, of importance in this case—alluding to them briefly—required protection of merchantmen; required ships of war or privateers of the one party to do no injury to the other; and provided especial, purely exceptional, and exclusive privileges by each party to the other as to ships of war and privateers bringing prizes into port.

The treaty of alliance was not one-sided, for it imposed upon the United States a possible duty and burden in the fulfillment of the guaranty of French possessions in America "forever" against all other powers. This issue was presented without delay. The French revolution began; in 1793 the king was beheaded, when France was instantly brought face to face with the powers of Europe, and her possessions in America were soon wrested from her.

HISTORY OF THE SPOLIATIONS.

England was in the vanguard of the war, and concluded twenty-three treaties with her allies, in which they agreed to starve out the common enemy. To this end was it stipulated that all the ports should be shut against France; that no provisions should be permitted to be exported to France, and that these measures should be continued and others employed for the purpose of injuring French commerce and to bring that nation to just conditions of peace. (Treaty between Great Britain and Prussia, July 14, 1793.) The animus of the alliance is further shown in the instruction of the Czar, who directed his admiral, in fulfillment of stipulations with Great Britain, to prevent the French from receiving supplies, and to that end to seize all French vessels and to send back to their own ports all neutral vessels bound to France, stating that while these measures were not "strictly conformable to the natural laws of war," they were justifiable when employed against "those arrant villains who have overturned all duties observed towards God, the laws, and the Government; who have even gone so far as to take the life of their own sovereign."

All Europe, except Sweden and Norway, was now arrayed against the new Republic in a bitterness of warfare scarcely with parallel, and which openly descended to an attempt to starve the French people into submission through an attack upon neutral commerce; a course admittedly unjustified by the laws of war. Naturally France looked to the United States for aid, relying upon the pledge of the treaty of 1778, and the assistance rendered us in our scarcely-concluded struggle by her fleet, armies, and treasury.

The commercial relations between France and the United States were already most unsatisfactory. Exceptional favors granted the United States in 1787 and 1788 (1 Foreign Relations, pp. 113–116) had been withdrawn and the equality upon which French and British vessels were put in our ports had excited jealousy. "No exceptional advantages had come to France from the war of the Revolution, and American commerce had reverted to its old British channels." (Treaties and Conventions, etc., Bancroft Davis, p. 985.)

Jefferson, who had been transferred from the legation in Paris to the office of Secretary of State, endeavored to secure the conclusion of a new commercial treaty, but unsuccessfully, and in April, 1792, we find him instructing Mr. Morris that "it will be impossible to defer longer than the next session of Congress some counter regulations for the protection of our navigation and commerce. I must entreat you therefore to avail yourself of every occasion of friendly remonstrance on this subject. If they wish an equal and cordial treaty with us we are ready to enter into it." (3 Jefferson's Works, p. 356.) In June he again writes that "we can not consent to the late innovations without taking measures to do justice to our own navigation" (ibid., p. 449), and after the imprisonment of the King he informed Morris that some matters, such "as reforming the unfriendly restrictions on our commerce and navigation," might be transacted even by the revolutionary government, as a government de facto (ibid., p. 489).

The new French minister, M. Genet, started for the United States in the spring of 1793 armed with three hundred blank commissions "to distribute to such as [would] fit out cruisers in our ports to prey on the British commerce." (1 Foreign Relations, p. 354.) Finally, the condition of affairs caused by the war led to the President's proclamation of neutrality, from which, curiously, and by way of compromise, the word "neutrality" was omitted. (3 Jefferson's Works, 591.)

Genet arrived in the United States the 8th of April, and on the 22d of that month the proclamation was issued declaring that "the duty and interest of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial towards the belligerent powers."

Already at Charleston, where he landed, Genet had commissioned privateers and sent them to sea, asserting this action to be authorized by the treaty of 1778, and informing the Secretary of State of his wish that the Federal Government "should observe, as far as in their power, the public engagements contracted by both nations; and that by this generous and prudent conduct they will give at least to the world the example of a true neutrality which does not consist in the cowardly abandonment of their friends in the moment when danger menaces them, but in adhering strictly, if they can do no better, to the obligations they have contracted with them." (Foreign Relations, vol. 1, p. 151.)

In September following Genet asked for fire-arms and cannon to protect the French possessions guarantied by the United States, but he was answered by the Secretary of War with what he terms "an ironical carelessness" that "the principles established by the President in his proclamation did not permit him to lend us so much as a 'pistol.'" (Nineteenth Congress, first session, Senate Doc. 102, p. 219.)

The French law of May 15, 1791, which "inhibited Americans from introducing, selling, and arming their vessels," in France, and "from enjoying all the advantages allowed to those built in the ship-yards of the Republic," was suspended by the national convention the 19th day of February, 1793, when extensive privileges were granted our commerce (ibid, p. 35), but in less than three months (9th May, 1793) seventeen days after the date of the President's proclamation, but before news of its contents could have been received, the national convention issued a decree ordering the arrest of any neutral vessels laden with provisions bound to an enemy's port. That this was an open and palpable violation of neutral rights was not denied, for it was a measure understood to be retaliatory to the course pursued by Great Britain, and compensation was promised to those neutrals who should suffer by its operation. (Ibid, p. 42.)

This decree of May 9, 1793, authorized French vessels of war and privateers to arrest neutral vessels laden with provisions, the property of neutrals, but destined to an enemy's port, or laden with enemy's merchandise, the merchandise to be prize, and the neutral provisions to be paid for, together with proper freight and indemnity for delay. The 23d of the same month American vessels were exempted from the operation of this decree (1 Foreign Relations, p. 244); five days later this second decree was suspended; July 1 it was again put in force; and July 27 it was repealed, leaving the decree of May 9 finally in force as against American commerce (3 Foreign Relations, p. 284). Our minister remonstrated, and the national assembly vacillated; nevertheless the decree was executed in plain and admitted violation of neutral rights.

The decree of May 9, 1793, and that of November 18, 1794, directed the seizure of neutral vessels containing enemy's goods, although the treaty of 1778 expressly provided that "free ships make free goods" (Art. XVIII, Treaty of Commerce); and further, under an ordinance of 1744 revived for the purpose, a foreign vessel having on board a supercargo or officer from an enemy's country, or whose crew was by more than one-third subjects of an enemy, was adjud ed prize. Mere clearance for some of the West India Islands, by decree of February 1, 1797, subjected neutral vessels to capture. The decree of January 18, 1798, issued by the council of five hundred, condemned neutral vessels carrying any British merchandise, and March 2, 1797, came into force the requirement of the crew list or "rôle d'équipage," which will be more fully considered hereafter. (Doc. 102, p. 160.)

President Washington, in 1793 (message December 5), spoke of the vexations and spoliations understood to have been committed on our vessels and commerce by the cruisers and officers of some of the belligerent powers as requiring attention, and suggested that on receipt of proofs, "due measures would be taken to obtain redress of the past and more effectual provisions against the future;" whereupon proof began immediately to be furnished.

Before this, the Secretary of State, then Mr. Jefferson, had advertised to the world assurances of governmental protection and aid.

"I have it in charge from the President [he said in his circular of August 27, 1793] to assure the merchants of the United States concerned in foreign commerce or navigation, that our attention will be paid to any injuries they may suffer on the high seas or in foreign countries, contrary to the laws of nations and existing treaties, and that on their forwarding hither well authenticated evidence of the same, proper proceedings will be adopted for their relief."

Mr. Morris had already brought to the attention of the French minister of foreign affairs "the obnoxious acts of the late assembly," but without securing redress, as "the attention of the Government was too strongly directed towards itself" to think of exterior interests, "and the assembly, at open war with the executive, would certainly reject whatever should now be presented to them." (Document 102, p. 31.)

Meantime our relations with Great Britain had become extremely threatening, various questions growing out of the Revolution still remained unadjusted, and when the instructions given by the admiralty June 8, 1793, became known in the United States it was felt that decisive action could not be longer delayed. These instructions directed the commanders of His Majesty's ships of war and privateers to seize all vessels loaded with corn, flour, or meal bound to any port in France, or to any port occupied by French armies, and to send the vessels thus seized into any convenient harbor that the cargo might be purchased by the British Government and the ships released; also to seize all ships, whatever their cargo, bound to a blockaded port; also to warn off under penalty of seizure any vessel destined to a port not actually blockaded, but "declared" to be blockaded. (Foreign Relations, vol. 1, p. 240.)

Great Britain, when complaint was made of these orders, attempted to justify them upon the insufficient plea that provisions were contraband of war. (Foreign Relations, vol. 1, pp. 240, 448 et seq.) Correspondence leading to no prospect of a satisfactory result, the President nominated Mr. Jay as minister, saying to the Senate (April 16, 1794) that "as peace ought to be pursued with unremitted zeal before the last resource, which has so often been the scourge of nations, and can not fail to check the advanced prosperity of the United States, is contemplated," he had concluded to take this action. (Foreign Relations, vol. 1, p. 447.) The instructions given Mr. Jay are not of importance in this connection, as it is sufficient to note the result of his negotiation in the treaty that bears his name, and to compare its important provisions with our agreement made in 1778 with the King of France.

We had promised France that their ships of war and privateers might freely carry whithersoever they pleased the ships and goods taken from their enemies; that these prizes should not be arrested, or seized, or examined, or searched in our ports, but might at any time freely leave, while no shelter or refuge was to be given to vessels having made prize of her "subjects, people, or property." (Article 17, treaty of commerce, 1778.) The United States had thus given France, and for consideration, not only a valuable but an exclusive right; yet the Jay treaty in the twenty-fifth article gave these same privileges to Great Britain, excluding all vessels which "should have made prize upon [her] subjects."

The conflict of the treaties is evident, and of course was fully appreciated at the time.

While the Jay treaty was concluded in November, 1794, its ratifications were not exchanged until October the following year, and mean time the British orders in council directing seizure of our vessels and provisions bound to France were so enforced as to call forth from Mr. Randolph, then Secretary of State, the warning, as late as July, 1795, that the Jay treaty had not yet been ratified by the President; "the late British order in council for seizing provisions is a weighty obstacle to ratification. I do not suppose that such an attempt to starve France will be countenanced." (Foreign Relations, vol. 1, p. 719.) Every endeavor was made by the United States to secure a repeal of the admiralty order, but without success, and finally our minister in London, Mr. Adams, was instructed that if, after every prudent effort, he found it could not be removed, its continuance was not to be an obstacle to the exchange of ratifications. The order was not removed or modified; nevertheless ratifications of the treaty were exchanged the following October.

It should here be noted that soon after the exchange a commission was organized which, among other subjects, was to ascertain the amount of the claims of American citizens on Great Britain for captures made in violation of international law. After various interruptions the labors of this tribunal closed in February, 1804, when awards considerably exceeding a million and a quarter pounds sterling had been made in favor of the United States on account of these claims. (Treaties and Conventions, Bancroft Davis, p. 1014-1016.) This commission existed by virtue of the sixth and seventh articles of the Jay treaty, the latter of which provided that whereas complaints had been made by citizens of the United States that during the course of the war "in which His Majesty is now engaged they have sustained considerable losses and damage by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property under color of authority or commissions from His Majesty," it was agreed that where adequate compensation could not then be actually obtained in the ordinary course of justice full compensation would be made by the British Government.

Note further that these claims were for spoliations committed by England to starve the French, as the claims now before us are for spoliations committed by France to feed her people, and, again, remember, by way of explanation, that the remedy alluded to in the Jay treaty, as being perhaps obtainable in due course of justice, was a possible recovery by the captured vessel in an action against the privateer upon his bond.

Mr. Morris, proving unacceptable to the French Government, was recalled at their request, and succeeded by Mr. Monroe, who endeavored to secure from his colleague, Mr. Jay, information as to the latter's negotiation, which was refused, as Monroe declined to pledge himself not to communicate it to the French Government. (1 Foreign Relations, pp. 517, 700.) France was restive under the situation, and, shortly after the ratification of the treaty, asked whether the President had caused orders to be given to prevent the sale of prizes conducted into ports of the United States by vessels of the Republic or privateers armed under its authority. As to this question the Secretary of State informed the President—

"That the twenty-fifth article of the British treaty having explicitly forbidden the arming of [French] privateers, and the selling of their prizes in the ports of the United States, the Secretary of the Treasury prepared, as a matter of course, circular letters to the collectors to conform to the restriction contained in that [article of the British treaty] as the law of the land. This was the more necessary as formerly the collectors were instructed to admit to an entry and sale the prizes brought into our ports by the French."

The Secretary also wrote our minister in London that orders had been given to prevent the sale of prizes brought into United States ports by French privateers, "conformably with the twenty-fifth article" of the Jay treaty. So we had finally and openly transferred any exclusive rights of France under the treaty of commerce to her bitter enemy, Great Britain.

But we had another obligation towards our former ally, that of guarantying her West India Islands.

Long prior to this, Jefferson, while in Paris, had told the British minister there, during a discussion as to the effect of the treaties of 1778 in case of war between France and Great Britain, and told him "frankly and without hesitation," that the dispositions of the United States would then be neutral, and that this would be to the interest of both powers, because it would relieve both from all anxiety as to feeding their West India Islands; that England, too, by suffering us to remain so, would avoid a heavy land war on our continent, which might very much cripple her proceedings elsewhere; that our treaty [with France], indeed, obliged us to receive into our ports the armed vessels of France, with their prizes, and to refuse admission to the prizes made on her by her enemies; that there was a clause also by which we guarantied to France her American possessions, and which might perhaps force us into the war if these were attacked. "Then it will be war," said the minister, "for they will assuredly be attacked."

In 1780 another American minister informed the English secretary of state for foreign affairs "that in a war between Great Britain and the House of Bourbon (a thing which must happen at some time) we [the United States] can give the West India Islands to whom we please, without engaging in the war ourselves, and our conduct must be governed by our interest" (Waite's American State Papers, vol. 10, p. 97); and this in face of a treaty concluded but twelve years before, wherein we pledged ourselves to a guaranty "forever" of the possessions in America of that very House of Bourbon. Early in 1794, Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State, said, as to this subject, that he had no doubt we should interpose at the proper time "and declare both to England and France that these islands are to rest with France, and that we will make a common cause with the latter for that object." (Jefferson to Madison, April 3, 1794, Jefferson's Works, vol. 4, p. 103.)

The understanding, therefore, seems to have been clear, yet the West India Islands went to England.

The French spoliations began heedlessly through the mistaken action of subordinates, who confounded Americans with English, because of the identity of race and language. In October, 1793, Mr. Deforgues wrote to Mr. Morris:

"We hope that the Government of the United States will attribute to their true cause the abuses of which you complain, as well as other violations of which our cruisers may render themselves guilty in the course of the present war. It must perceive how difficult it is to contain within just limits the indignation of our marines, and, in general, of all the French patriots against a people speaking the same language and having the same habits as the free Americans. The difficulty of distinguishing our allies from our enemies has often been the cause of offenses committed on board your vessels. All that the Administration can do is to order indemnification to those who have suffered and to punish the guilty." (Doc. 102, p. 70.)

Not long, however, could this plaintive response suffice as an excuse for the outrages committed upon our citizens and their property, for, as we have seen by the decrees already cited (and there were many more), the Assembly soon joined in the attack, authorized it, and rendered it governmental.

A single mistaken capture might be forgiven, provided proper compensation were made for injury to the citizen; but, when wholesale seizures were directed by the legislature and thereupon made by the Executive, the matter assumed a much more serious and difficult aspect. To use the words of Mr. Sumner:

"As intelligence of these spoliations reached the United States our whole commerce was fluttered. Merchants hesitated to expose ships and cargoes to such cruel hazards, and thereupon appeared the circular letter of the Secretary of State and the President's proclamation encouraging, by the promise of protection, those injured by the spoliators."

So ended the first phase of this controversy with a nation to whom we were bound by the strongest treaty ties, a nation engaged in war against an apparently overwhelming force and whose enemies used means of attack openly admitted to be contrary to the laws of civilized warfare; in alleged self-defense, it pursued an equally if not more indefensible, course which resulted in severe and unjustifiable loss to our citizens. That this system of seizures or spoliations was forbidden by every principle of civilized warfare was frankly admitted at the time, and later, England, which had pursued a similar course, made ample amends, and Spain, which had countenanced the policy of France and lent her ports in aid of it, did the same.

Nor were we altogether clear of blame. We had not complied, so far as appears, with the stipulations of the treaties of 1778, intended to provide for possible war; we had not protected the West India Islands, and not only had we refrained from acting as the ally of France, but, by the Jay treaty, we had given to her enemy the exclusive port privileges which she most valued, and which were secured to her by the treaty of amity and commerce.

It is not for us to criticise the patriotism and wisdom of the American statesmen of that day, the leading figures of our history, the men who bore the brunt of the fight which brought thirteen struggling colonies through a war with one of the mightiest and bravest nations of Europe to the successful issue which made possible the United States of to-day, with its thirty-eight States, eight Territories, and population of not far from 60,000,000.

Responsible for the welfare and future of a little republic of some two and a half millions of inhabitants, exhausted by seven years' warfare, and environed on this continent by the three great monarchies of Europe; their country poor in finance, weak in population, and an object of jealousy and distrust to every sovereign, these eminent men dealt in a spirit of enlightened patriotism and high courage with the political questions presented to them, according to their best and well-trained judgment, in the light of the information they then had. We now, as a judicial body, treat the facts as they are presented in relation to private rights, and no judgment of ours can properly be held, as it has been argued it would be, to reflect in any manner upon the course pursued by the President, his advisers and subordinates in the anxious period between 1789 and 1800. Upon their diplomatic foresight and ability no decision of ours can cast a shadow, and it must be clearly understood that we deal only with those private rights which may possibly have been invaded in the pursuit of a policy aiming at the life and prosperity of the nation.

The French complained of our course during the war then progressing, while we complained of spoliation and maltreatment of our vessels at sea, losses by the embargo at Bordeaux, non-payment of drafts drawn by the colonial administration, seizures of cargoes of vessels, non-performance of contracts by Government agents, condemnation of vessels and their cargoes in violation of the treaties of 1778, and captures under the decree of 1793. (1 Foreign Relations, p. 748 et seq.)

Pinckney was ordered out to replace Monroe under particular instructions to "look into" the claims of our citizens (ibid., 742), but before he arrived the decree of October 31, 1796, was made public, which prohibited the importation of manufactured articles, whether of English make or English commerce (6 Garden, 117), and Pinckney upon his arrival was not recognized or received, but ordered to leave France, as that government would receive no minister from the United States "until after a reparation of the grievances demanded of the American Government, and which the French Republic had a right to expect." (1 Foreign Relations, p. 746.)

The strained relations between the two countries can not be better illustrated than by an extract from the speech of the president of the directory made to Monroe in the presence of the diplomatic corps, when the latter, on the 30th December, 1796, took his official leave. Upon that occasion the president said:

"By presenting this day to the executive directory your letters of recall you offer a very strange spectacle to Europe. France, rich in her freedom, surrounded by the train of her victories, and strong in the esteem of her allies, will not stoop to calculate the consequences of the condescension of the American Government to its ancient tyrants. The French Republic expects, however, that the successors of Columbus, Raleigh, and Penn, always proud of their liberty, will never forget that they owe it to France. They will weigh in their wisdom the magnanimous friendship of the French people with the crafty caresses of perfidious men who meditate to bring them again under their former yoke. Assure the good people of America, Mr. Minister, that, like them, we adore liberty; that they will always possess our esteem, and find in the French people that republican generosity which knows how to grant peace as well as to cause its sovereignty to be respected." (1 Foreign Relations, 747.)

The speech, as President Adams said, discloses sentiments—

"More alarming than the refusal of a minister, because more dangerous to our independence and union, and at the same time studiously marked with indignities towards the Government of the United States. It evinces a disposition to separate the people of the United States from the Government. * * * Such attempts ought to be repelled with a decision which shall convince France and the world that we are not a degraded people, humiliated under a colonial spirit of fear and sense of inferiority, fitted to be the miserable instruments of foreign influence, and regardless of national honor, character, and interest." (Foreign Relations, page 40.)

The President added that, having no diplomatic representative in France, he had no means of obtaining official information, but believing that a decree had been passed contravening in part the commercial treaty of 1778, he laid a copy of that instrument before the Congress, stating that it was his "indispensable duty to recommend to [their] consideration effectual measures of defense." Congress were, however, peacefully inclined, although before adjourning they passed the law providing passports for American vessels. (1 Stat. L., 489.)

PINCKNEY MISSION.

Soon after the adjournment (June 22) Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry were commissioned envoys to France for the purpose of endeavoring to renew relations with that country.

Jefferson, then Vice-President, immediately wrote Gerry:

"That peace is undoubtedly at present the first object of our nation. Interest and honor are also national considerations. But interest duly weighed, is in favor of peace, even at the expense of spoliations, past and future, and honor can not now be an object. The insults and injuries committed on us by both the belligerent parties from the beginning of 1793 to this day, and still continuing, can not be wiped off by engaging in war with one of them. Our countrymen have divided themselves by such strong affections to the French and the English that nothing will secure us internally but a divorce from both nations." (Jefferson's Works, volume 4, page 187.)

The tone and intent of the instructions to these envoys may be understood from one paragraph in Mr. Pickering's letter to them (Doc. 102, p. 464, July 15, 1797):

"Finally, the great object of the Government being to do justice to France and her citizens, if in anything we have injured them; to obtain justice for the multiplied injuries they have committed against us, and to preserve peace; your style and manner of proceeding will be such as shall most directly tend to secure these objects."

The envoys had hardly reached Paris when another decree was aimed against our suffering merchants which prohibited every vessel that had entered an English port from being admitted into any port of the French Republic, and handed over to condemnation every vessel laden in whole or in part with merchandise coming out of England or her possessions. (Doc. 102, p. 483.) The American ministers protested, saying that the decree attacked the interests and independence of neutral powers; that it took from them the profits of an honest and lawful industry, as well as an inestimable privilege of conducting their own affairs as their judgment might direct, and added that acquiescence in it would establish a precedent for national degradation which would authorize any measures power might be disposed to practice. (Doc. 102, p. 483, et seq.)

France leaned to dictation, not negotiation. With Bonaparte successful in Italy and Talleyrand at the head of foreign affairs, she was in a far from conciliatory temper. The result was that without ever being received officially, the envoys returned, not, however, before Talleyrand had, as a set-off to their demands, presented the counter-claims of France. (2 Foreign Relations, 190.)

During this mission occurred the notorious X. Y. Z. episode when demands were made upon the ministers by individuals, veiled in the dispatches under these mysterious letters, for a large sum of money as a douceur to the directory, and an additional and much larger amount, as a loan to France. Talleyrand later, and over his own signature, proposed a loan, omitting reference to the douceur, and in the same note complained of the Jay treaty as a principal grievance. The dispatches containing an account of the X. Y. Z. episode coming back from the United States in print, Gerry, the only envoy then remaining, left Paris on the 26th July, 1798. (Treaties and Conventions, Bancroft Davis, pp. 997-8.)

The return of the mission created an effect at home very inimical to France; the President said he would never send another minister without assurances that he would be received, respected, and honored as "the representative of a great, free, powerful, and independent nation," (2 Foreign Relations, page 199); but before this (June 21, 1798), Congress had passed the act "to more effectually protect the commerce and coasts of the United States" (May 18, 1798, 1 Stat. L., 561), the act suspending commercial relations with France (June 13, 1798), and various other laws of similar import, which will be considered hereafter in connection with another branch of this case.

Washington was put in command of the Army as Lieutenant-General and Commander-in-Chief, and in accepting said (Annals, 5 Cong., 622):

"The conduct of the directory of France towards our country; their insidious hostility to its Government; their various practices to withdraw the affections of the people from it; the evident tendency of their acts and those of their agents to countenance and invigorate opposition; their disregard of solemn treaties and the law of nations; their war upon our defenseless commerce; their treatment of our ministers of peace; and their demands amounting to tribute, could not fail to excite in me corresponding sentiments with those my countrymen have so generally expressed."

ELLSWORTH MISSION.

This state of affairs could not long continue. Talleyrand, appreciating the dangers of the situation, soon opened indirect communication with the United States, and, on the 28th September, said that our plenipotentiary, if sent, would be "received with the respect due to the representative of a free, independent, and powerful nation." (Foreign Relations, 2, p. 212.) This was an exact compliance with the President's condition precedent, and thereupon Oliver Ellsworth, Chief-Justice of the United States; William R. Davie, late governor of North Carolina (Patrick Henry declining to serve); and William Vans Murray, minister resident at the Hague, were commissioned envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary "to discuss and settle by a treaty all controversies between the United States and France." (2 Foreign Relations, p. 243.) This mission, appointed in March, 1799, closed its labors by the treaty signed September 30, 1800.

Arriving in France they found the Directory no longer in existence, but treated with Napoleon, then become First Consul. Ministers were appointed to meet them, and on the 7th April, 1800, powers were exchanged and negotiations began. (Doc. 102, p. 579.)

The Americans were instructed to inform the French ministers at the opening that we expected, "as an indispensable condition of the treaty," a stipulation to make our citizens "full compensation for all losses and damage which they shall have sustained by reason of irregular or illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and other property, under color of authority or commissions from the French Republic or its agents;" other points were urged upon them, but for the purpose of this case it is necessary only to note that they were to obtain a claims commission, to refuse recognition of the treaties of 1778, to refuse a guaranty, to refuse any aid or loan, and to make no engagement contrary to the Jay treaty. (2 Foreign Relations, p. 305.)

The Secretary of State said in his instructions:

"Instead of relief, instead of justice, instead of indemnity for past wrongs, our very moderate demands have been immediately followed by new aggressions and more extended depredations, while our ministers, seeking redress and reconciliation, have been refused a reception, treated with indignities, and finally driven from its territories. This conduct * * * would well have justified an immediate declaration of war, but * * * the United States contented themselves with preparations for defense, and measures calculated to protect their commerce."

At the close of his instruction the Secretary sets out certain points to be considered as ultimata, of which the following only is now important:

"1. That there be established a board to determine the claims of our citizens, which France should bind herself to pay."

VALIDITY OF CLAIMS AGAINST FRANCE.

Having carried the history of the claims down to this point let us look back upon it and see what rights we had at that time as against France, laying aside for the moment certain defenses set up by the defendants, such as the existence of war, and the abrogation of old treaties. Apart from these points, which have been urged upon us with great ability by the learned counsel for the Government, were the claims at the opening of the negotiations in 1800 valid international obligations against France?

That nation had seized upon the high seas neutral vessels laden with neutral cargo. In the case at bar, for example, the American schooner Sally, owned by citizens of the United States, commanded by a citizen of the United States, duly registered under the laws of the United States, bound from Massachusetts to Spain, laden with cargo belonging to American citizens, was seized upon the high seas, taken into a French port, condemned, and confiscated for the benefit of the privateer which seized her; and all this, not upon the ground that she had violated the law of nations, but because she had violated the French regulations "concerning the navigation of neutrals." It seems hardly necessary to discuss the proposition that such a proceeding was unwarranted; the French themselves admitted it in their decrees and correspondence; the Russian Czar, in ordering his admiral to pursue a similar course, said it was not "strictly conformable to the natural laws of war." England paid for damages thus committed, as did Spain, which had countenanced the acts of French consuls in condemning American vessels brought into Spanish ports. (Treaty of 1819.)

Senator Livingston in the Twenty-first Congress (first session) said in the report made by him:

"The committee does not recollect that the justice of the claims has ever been denied. * * * To deny [it] would be an assertion of a right on the part of France to indiscriminate plunder of neutral property. * * * But the justice of the claims was not denied, and the necessity of providing indemnity was expressly acknowledged."

This is true as a matter of pure international law; how much more true is it in the face of a treaty which guarantied the protection to our vessels (Article VI) of French ships of war; which made free ships free goods (Article XXIII); which prohibited opening hatches or disturbing packages when the vessel had a passport (Articles XII and XIII); which directed the commanders of French ships to do no "injury or damage" to vessels of the United States (Article XV), and which contained other provisions insuring an exceptional amount of protection to our commerce and guardianship of our commercial rights?

Mr. Jefferson thought this class of claims valid when he issued his circular of August, 1793, assuring the mercantile community that due attention would be paid to these injuries and proper proceedings adopted for their relief. The President thought them valid when later in the same year he wrote to Congress that due measures would be taken to "obtain redress of the past and more effective provisions against the future." Pickering thought them valid when he made their settlement an ultimatum, and the French Government thought them worthy of consideration when they proposed a commission to decide upon them, coupled with the counter proposition that the United States indemnify American creditors then existing, or to be created through the agency of this commission, by way of a loan to France, which that country was to be pledged to repay. (Doc. 102, p. 467.)

STATE OF WAR.

The defendants contend that the seizures were justified, as war existed between this country and France during the period in question; and, as we could have no claim against France for seizure of private property in time of war, the claimants could have no resulting claim against their own Government; that is, the claims, being invalid, could not form a subject of set-off as it is urged these claims did in the second article of the treaty of 1800. It therefore becomes of great importance to determine whether there was a state of war between the two countries.

It is urged that the political and judicial departments of each Government recognized the other as an enemy; that battles were fought and blood shed on the high seas; that property was captured by each from the other and condemned as prize; that diplomatic and consular intercourse was suspended, and that prisoners had been taken by each Government from the other and "held for exchange, punishment, or retaliation, according to the laws and usages of war." While these statements may be in substance admitted and constitute very strong evidence of the existence of war, still they are not conclusive, and the facts, even if they existed to the extent claimed, may not be inconsistent with a state of reprisals straining the relations of the states to their utmost tension, daily threatening hostilities of a more serious nature, but still short of that war which abrogates treaties, and after the conclusion of which the parties must, as between themselves, begin international life anew.

The French issued decree after decree against our peaceful commerce, but on the ground of military necessity incident to the war with Great Britain and her allies; they refused to receive our minister, but in that refusal, insolent though it was, there is nothing to show that war was intended, and the mere refusal to receive a minister does not in itself constitute a ground for hostilities.

The Attorney-General, Mr. Lee, in August, 1798, very strongly sustained the defendants' position, for he wrote the Secretary of State that there existed with France "not only an actual maritime war," but "a maritime war authorized by both nations;" that consequently France was an enemy, to aid and assist whom would be treason on the part of a citizen of the United States; but we can not agree that this extreme position was authorized by the facts or the law.

Congress enacted the various statutes hereinafter referred to in detail, and when one of them, the act providing an additional armament, was passed in the House, Edward Livingston, who opposed it, said:

"Let no man flatter himself that the vote which has been given is not a declaration of war. Gentlemen know that this is the case."

Those were times of great excitement; between danger of international contest and the heat of internal partisan conflict statesmen could not look at the situation with the calmness possessed by their successors, and those successors, with some exceptions, to be sure, regarded the relations between the countries as not amounting to war.

The question has been carefully examined by authorized and competent officers of the political department of the Government, and we may turn to their statements as expository of the views of that branch upon the subject.

In 1827 Senator Holmes reported that there had been a "partial war," but no

"such actual open war as would absolve us from treaty stipulations. * * * It was never understood here that this was such a war as would annul a treaty." (Nineteenth Congress, second session, Senate Report, February 8, 1827, p. 8.)

Mr. Giles, reporting to the House of Representatives as early as 1802, called it a "partial state of hostility" between the United States and France.

Mr. Chambers reported to the Senate in 1828 that—

"The relations which existed between the two nations in the interval between the passage of the several acts of Congress before referred to and the convention of 1800 were very peculiar, but in the opinion of your committee can not be considered as placing the two nations in the attitude of a war which would destroy the obligations of previously existing treaties."

Mr. Livingstone reported to the Senate in 1830 that—

"This was not a case of war, and the stipulations which reconciled the two nations was not a treaty of peace; it was a convention for the putting an end to certain differences. * * * Nowhere is the slightest expression on either side that a state of war existed, which would exonerate either party from the obligations of making those indemnities to the other. * * * The convention which was the result of these negotiations is not only in its form different from a treaty of peace, but it contains stipulations which would be disgraceful to our country on the supposition that it terminated a state of war. * * * Neither party considered then they were in a state of war." (Rep. 4, 445.)

Mr. Everett made a statement in the House of Representatives on the 21st February, 1835, in which he said:

"The extreme violence of the measures of the French Government and the accumulated injuries heaped upon our citizens would have amply justified the Government of the United States in a recourse to war; but peaceful remedies and measures of defense were preferred; [and, after referring to the acts of Congress, he adds]: These vigorous acts of defense and preparation, evincing that, if necessary, the United States were determined to proceed still further and go to war for the protection of their citizens, had the happy effect of precluding a resort to that extreme measure of redress."

Finally, Mr. Sumner considered the acts of Congress as "vigorous measures," putting the country "in an attitude of defense;" and that the "painful condition of things, though naturally causing great anxiety, did not constitute war." (Thirty-eighth Congress, first session, Rep. Com. No. 41, 1864.)

The judiciary also had occasion to consider the situation, and the learned counsel for defendants cites us to the opinion of Mr. Justice Moore delivered in the case of Bass against Tingy (4 Dallas, 37), wherein the facts were as follows: Tingy, commander of the public armed ship the Ganges, had libelled the American ship Eliza, Bass, master, setting forth that she had been taken on the high seas by a French privateer the 31st March, 1799, and retaken by him late in the following April, wherefore salvage was claimed and allowed below. Upon appeal the judgment was affirmed. Each of the four justices present delivered an opinion.

Justice Moore, answering the contention that the word "enemy" could not be applied to the French, says:

"How can the character of the parties engaged in hostility or war be otherwise described than by the denomination of enemies? It is for the honor and dignity of both nations, therefore, they should be called enemies; for it is by that description alone that either could justify or excuse the scene of bloodshed, depredation, and confiscation which has unhappily occurred, and surely Congress could only employ the language of the act of June 13, 1798, towards a nation whom she considered as an enemy."

Justice Washington considers the very point now in dispute, saying (p. 40):

"The decision of the question must depend upon * * * whether, at the time of passing the act of Congress of the 2d of March, 1799, there subsisted a state of war between two nations. It may, I believe, be safely laid down that every contention by force between two nations in external matters under the authority of their respective Governments is not only war, but public war. If it be decreed in form it is called solemn and is of the perfect kind, because one whole nation is at war with another whole nation, and all the members of the nation declaring war are authorized to commit hostilities against the members of the other in every place and under every circumstance.

"In such a war all the members act under a general authority, and all the rights and consequences of war attach to their condition. But hostilities may subsist between two nations more confined in its nature and extent, being limited as to places, persons, and things, and this is more properly termed imperfect war, because not solemn, and because those who are authorized to commit hostilities act under special authority and can go no further than to the extent of their commission. Still, however, it is public war, because it is an external contention by force between some of the members of the two nations, authorized by the legitimate powers. It is a war between the two nations, though all the members are not authorized to commit hostilities such as in a solemn war where the Government restrain the general power."

Applying this rule he held that "an American and French armed vessel, combating on the high seas, were enemies," but added that France was not styled "an enemy" in the statutes, because "the degree of hostility meant to be carried on was sufficiently described without declaring war or declaring that we were at war. Such a declaration by Congress might have constituted a perfect state of war, which was not intended by the Government."

Justice Chase, who had tried the case below, said:

"It is a limited, partial war. Congress has not declared war in general terms, but Congress has authorized hostilities on the high seas by certain persons in certain cases. There is no authority given to commit hostilities on land, to capture unarmed French vessels, nor even to capture French armed vessels in a French port, and the authority is not given indiscriminately to every citizen of America against every citizen of France, but only to citizens appointed by commissions or exposed to immediate outrage and violence. * * * If Congress had chosen to declare a general war, France would have been a general enemy; having chosen to wage a partial war, France was * * * only a partial enemy."

Justice Patterson concurred, holding that the United States and France were "in a qualified state of hostility"—war "quoad hoc." As far as Congress tolerated and authorized it, so far might we proceed in hostile operations, and the word "enemy" proceeds the full length of this qualified war, and no further.

The Supreme Court, therefore, held the state of affairs now under discussion to constitute partial warfare, limited by the acts of Congress.

The instructions to Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, dated October 22, 1799, did not recognize a state of war as existing, or as having existed, for they said the conduct of France would have justified an immediate declaration of war, but the United States, desirous of maintaining peace, contented themselves "with preparations for defense and measures calculated to defend their commerce." (Doc. 102, p. 561). Yet all the measures relied upon as evidence of existing war had taken effect prior to the date of these instructions. So the ministers, in a communication to the French authorities, said, as to the acts of Congress, "which the hard alternative of abandoning their commerce to ruin imposed," that "far from contemplating a co-operation with the enemies of the Republic [they] did not even authorize reprisals upon her merchantmen, but were restricted simply to the giving of safety to their own, till a moment should arrive when their sufferings could be heard and redressed." (Doc. 102, p. 583.)

France did not consider that war existed, for her minister said that the suspensions of his functions was not to be regarded as a rupture between the countries, "but as a mark of just discontent" (15 November, 1796, 1 Foreign Relations, 533), while J. Bonaparte and his colleagues termed it a "transient misunderstanding" (Doc. 102, p. 590), a state of "misunderstanding" which had existed "through the acts of some agents rather than by the will of the respective "Governments," and which had not been a state of war, at least on the side of France (ibid., p. 616).

The opinion of Congress at the time is best gleaned from the laws which it passed. The important statute in this connection is that of May 28, 1798 (1 Stat. L., p. 561), entitled "An act more effectually to protect the commerce and coasts of the United States." Certainly there was nothing aggressive or warlike in this title.

The act recites that, whereas French armed vessels have committed depredations on American commerce in violation of the law of nations and treaties between the United States and France, the President is authorized—not to declare war, but to direct naval commanders to bring into our ports, to be proceeded against according to the law of nations, any such vessels "which shall have committed, or which shall be found hovering on the coasts of the United States for the purpose of committing depredations on the vessels belonging to the citizens thereof; and also to retake any ship or vessel of any citizen or citizens of the United States which may have been captured by any such armed vessel."

This law contains no declaration or threat of war; it is distinctly an act to protect our coasts and commerce. It says that our vessels may arrest a vessel raiding or intending to raid upon that commerce, and that such vessel shall not be either held by executive authority or confiscated, but turned over to the admiralty courts—recognized international tribunals—for trial, not according to municipal statutes, as was being done in France, but according to the law of nations. Such a statute hardly seems necessary, for if it extended at all the police powers of naval commanders upon the high seas it was in the very slightest degree, and it is highly improbable that then or now, with or without specific statutory or other authority, an American naval commander would in fact allow a vessel rightfully flying the flag of the United States to be seized on the high seas or near our coasts by the cruiser of another government. But if the act did enlarge the power of such officers, and give to them authority not theretofore possessed, it tied them down to specified action in regard to specified vessels.

They might seize armed vessels only, and only those armed vessels which had already committed depredations, or those which were on our coast for the purpose of committing depredations, and they might retake an American vessel captured by such an armed vessel. This statute is a fair illustration of the class of laws enacted at this time; they directed suspension of commercial relations until the end of the next session of Congress, not indefinitely (June 13, 1798, ibid., sec. 4 p. 556); they gave power to the President to apprehend the subjects of hostile nations whenever he should make "public proclamation" of war (July 6, 1798, ibid., p. 577), and no such proclamation was made; they gave him authority to instruct our armed vessels to seize French "armed," not merchant, vessels (July 9, 1798, ibid., p. 578), together with contingent authority to augment the Army in case war should break out, or in case of imminent danger of invasion (March 2, 1799, ibid., p. 725). Within a few months after this last act of Congress the Ellsworth mission was on its way to France to begin the negotiations which resulted in the treaty of 1800, and even the act abrogating the treaties of 1778 does not speak of war as existing, but of "the system of predatory violence * * * hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation." (July 7, 1798, ibid., p. 578.)

If war existed why authorize our armed vessels to seize French armed vessels? War itself gave that right, as well as the right to seize merchantmen, which the statutes did not permit. If war existed why empower the President to apprehend foreign enemies? War itself placed that duty upon him as a necessary and inherent incident of military command. Why, if there was war, should a suspension of commercial intercourse be authorized, for what more complete suspension of that intercourse could there be than the very fact of war; and why, if war did exist, should the President so late as March, 1799, be empowered to increase the Army upon one of two conditions, namely, that war should break out or invasion be imminent—that is, if war should break out in the future or invasion become imminent in the future?

Upon these acts of Congress alone it seems difficult to found a state of war up to March, 1799, while in February, 1800, we find a statute suspending enlistments, unless, during the recess of Congress, "war should break out with France." This is proof positive that Congress did not then consider war as existing, and in fact Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray were at the time hard at work in Paris. In May following the President was instructed to suspend action under the act providing for military organization, although the treaty was not concluded until the following September.

This legislation shows that war was imminent; that protection of our commerce was ordered, but distinctly shows that, in the opinion of the legislature, war did not in fact exist.

Wheaton draws a distinction between two classes of war, saying:

"A perfect war is where one whole nation is at war with another nation, and all the members of both nations are authorized to commit hostilities against all the members of the other, in every case, and under every circumstance permitted by the general laws of war. An imperfect war is limited as to places, persons, and things [to which the editor adds:] Such were the limited hostilities authorized by the United States against France in 1798." (Lawrence Wheaton, p. 518).

There was no declaration of war; the tribunals of each country were open to the other—an impossibility were war in progress; diplomatic and commercial intercourse were admittedly suspended; but during many years there was no intercourse between England and Mexico, which were not at war; there was retaliation and reprisal, but such retaliations and reprisals have often occurred between nations at peace; there was a near approach to war, but at no time was one of the nations turned into an enemy of the other in such manner that every citizen of the one became the enemy of every citizen of the other; finally, there was not that kind of war which abrogated treaties and wiped out, at least temporarily, all pending rights and contracts, individual and national.

In cases like this "the judicial is bound to follow the action of the political department of the Government, and is concluded by it" (Phillips vs. Phillips, 92 U. S., 130); and we do not find an act of Congress or the Executive between the years 1793 and 1801 which recognizes an existing state of solemn war, although we find statutory provisions authorizing a certain course "in the event of a declaration of war," or "whenever there shall be a declared war," or during the existing "differences." One act provides for an increase of the Army "in case war shall break out," while another restrains this increase "unless war shall break out" (1 Stat. L., pp. 558, 577, 725, 759; see also acts of February 10, 1800, and May 14, 1800).

We have already referred to the instructions of the Executive, which show that branch of the Government in thorough accord with the legislative on this subject, and the negotiations of our representatives hereinafter referred to were marked by the same views, while the treaty itself—a treaty of amity and commerce of limited duration—is strong proof that what were called "differences" did not amount to war. We are therefore of opinion that no such war existed as operated to abrogate treaties, to suspend private rights, or to authorize indiscriminate seizures and condemnations; that, in short, there was no public general war, but limited war in its nature similar to a prolonged series of reprisals.

NEGOTIATION OF THE TREATY OF 1800.

The general effect and purpose of the treaty of 1800 can be clearly gleaned from the negotiations preceding its signiture, which will next be considered.

The treaties of 1778 provided that French men-of-war should protect our vessels and citizens (treaty of commerce, article 6); that our merchantmen having passports and certificates showing their cargoes not to be contraband should not have their hatches opened, their packages disturbed, or the "smallest parcels of goods" removed (articles 12 and 13); that a French man-of-war meeting an American merchantman should remain out of cannon shot, and send on board not more than three men, when, should the merchantman have a passport, he might proceed (article 27); freedom of trade was secured and contraband defined.

Soon after the French revolution the series of attacks upon our commerce began, at first veiled under the excuse of mistake, then of a necessary self-defense, coupled with promise of compensation, and finally open and undisguised. First it was said that the seizures were accidental, as the two English-speaking nations could not be distinguished by the French sailors. Soon after all neutral vessels laden with provisions and bound to an enemy's port were ordered seized as a war measure, but compensation was promised; and it was then that the President and Secretary of State, having already issued the proclamation of neutrality, which greatly incensed France, voluntarily promised protection and redress to citizens of the United States thus injured by our former ally.

At this point, therefore, we have on both sides an admission of the validity of claims arising from the spoliations—the President, in the proclamation and circular letter, the French, in their decrees, as well as in a letter to the Secretary of State (March 27, 1794), in which the French minister wrote that "if any of your merchants have suffered any injury by the conduct of our privateers * * * they may with confidence address themselves to the French Government." (Doc. 102, p. 264.) Nearly four months later the French commissioner of foreign relations informed our minister that there should not be a doubt of the disposition of the convention and Government to "make good the losses which circumstances inseparable from a great revolution may have caused some American navigators to experience." (July 5, 1794; ibid., p. 77.) Then came Genet's dismissal; Jay was sent to England, and Monroe, succeeding Morris, seemed to have progressed so successfully that Washington announced to Congress (February 20, 1795) "that these claims are in a train of being discussed with candor, and amicably adjusted." (Waite's American State Papers, vol. 3, p. 402.)

The Jay treaty entirely changed the situation; France violently remonstrated, treated Monroe with insult, refused to receive Pinckney, threw off the last restraints upon its cruisers and privateers, and its colonial agents joined with so much vigor in the illegal attack upon a peaceful neutral commerce, that "American vessels no longer entered the French ports unless carried in by force." (Doc. 102, pp. 434, 435.)

Just complaint was not, however, confined to one side, for we had failed in performance of obligations imposed upon us by the treaties of 1778. We had undertaken a guaranty of French possessions in America and pledged ourselves that "in case of a rupture between France and England the reciprocal guaranty * * * shall have its full force and effect the moment such war shall break out." (Article 12, treaty of alliance.) This guaranty was to endure "forever." It was contended by us that the casus fœderis could never occur except in a defensive war. As Secretary Pickering said:

"The nature of this obligation is understood to be that when a war really and truly defensive exists the engaging nation is bound to furnish an effectual and adequate defense in co-operation with the power attacked." (Doc. 102, p. 457, Pickering to Pinckney et al., July 15, 1797.)

Whether the treaty so limited the obligation, or whether France in her struggle with the allied powers was waging a defensive war, is not now important. France certainly believed herself entitled to demand our aid, and understood the casus fœderis to have occurred.

At the opening of the war France possessed the fertile islands of St. Domingo, Martinique, Guadeloupe, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Tobago, Deseada, Mariegalante, St. Pierre, Miquelon, and Grenada, with a colony on the main land at Cayenne, and "in little more than a month the French were entirely dispossessed of their West India possessions, with hardly any loss to the victorious nation." (Alison's History, vol 3, p. 396.)

The French colonists urged us to intervene, but the French Government thought it wiser for us not then to embark in the war, as it might diminish their supplies from America; they would, however, they said, leave us to act according to our wishes, looking to us meantime for financial aid. (1 Foreign Relations, p. 688.) This was not a renunciation of the guaranty, nor was it so regarded here.

A study of the correspondence shows that these provisions of the two treaties, especially the guaranty, constantly hampered our ministers, and Jefferson said he had no doubt "we should interpose at the proper time" (Jefferson's Works, vol. 43 p. 102), while the French Government dwelt upon the "inexecution of the treaties" (1 Foreign Relations, p. 658) said "they had much cause of complaint against us" (ibid., p. 731), and finally refused to receive Pinckney "until after a reparation of grievances," while their minister here demanded "in the name of American honor, in the name of the faith of the treaties, the execution of that contract which assured to the United States their existence and which France regarded as the pledge of the most sacred union between two people the freest upon earth." (1 Foreign Affairs, pp. 579 et seq.)

The claims of France, national in their nature, were thus set up again against the claims of the United States, individual in their inception, but made national by their presentation through the diplomatic department of the Government.

It is not for us to say whether the claims of France had any validity in international law, because for the purpose of this case it need only be observed that they were urged in diplomacy with every apparent belief that the French position was tenable. Whether valid or not, they were an efficient arm of defense against our contentions, and were so used with ability, skill, and success. In fact there is a recognition of apparent justness in these demands found in the instructions to the Pinckney mission, who were directed, while urging our claims, to propose a substitute for the mutual guaranty "or some modification of it," as "instead of troops or ships of war" "to stipulate for a moderate sum of money or quantity of provisions" to be delivered in any future defensive war "not exceeding $200,000 a year during any such war" (2 Foreign Relations, p. 155), and Talleyrand on the other side told Mr. Gerry (June 15) that the Republic desired to be restored to the rights which the treaties conferred upon it, and through these means to assure the rights of the United States. "You claim indemnities," he said, we "equally demand them, and this disposition being as sincere on the part of the United States as it is on its, [the Republic] will speedily remove all the difficulties." (Doc. 102, p. 529.)

Such was the situation when the Ellsworth mission arrived in France.

The instructions to this legation directed them as an "indispensable condition" to obtain full compensation for all losses and damages sustained by citizens of the United States from irregular or illegal captures or condemnations.

The French representatives did not dispute the validity of the claims, but stood upon the treaties of 1778. To their opening propositions the American envoys received a courteous response, which, however, put a new phase upon the negotiation, and placed them in a most embarrassing position. Bonaparte and his colleagues said in substance (6 May, 1800, Doc. 102, p. 590): The discharge of damages between the two nations resulting from the "transient misunderstanding" can be "considered only as a consequence of the interpretation" given by mutual consent to the treaties. They agreed "upon the expediency of compensation," and suggested that the discussion had become confined to two points, the principles which ought to govern the political and commercial relations of the two countries and the most suitable form for liquidating and discharging the indemnities due.

The examination of principles should come first in order, they said, for "indemnification can only result from an avowed violation of an acknowledged obligation," and an "agreement upon principles can alone assure peace and maintain friendship." The French ministers then, alluding to the treaties, referred to the second article of the draught submitted by the Americans, which provided that the commission suggested should decide claims "conformably to justice and the law of nations, and in all cases of complaint prior to the 7th of July 1798, they should pronounce agreeably to the treaties and consular convention then existing between France and the United States."

Now, this second article of the draft applied only to claims of citizens of each country, while July 7, 1798, was the date of the act of Congress annulling the treaties; but the French ministers ignoring this said that they saw no reasons for the distinction, as the treaties and convention are "the only foundations of the negotiations;" that from them arose the misunderstanding, and upon them "union and friendship should be established;" and they thus significantly concluded, "when the undersigned hastened to acknowledge the principle of compensation, it was in order to give an unequivocal evidence of the fidelity of the French Government to its ancient engagements, every pecuniary stipulation appearing to it expedient as a consequence of ancient treaties, and not as the preliminary of a new one." So the French were planted squarely on the treaties which the Americans were forbidden to consider as existing after July, 1798.

Two days later our ministers explained their position (ibid., 592), and nine days later wrote to the Secretary of State (ibid., 607) that their success was still doubtful, as the "French think it hard to indemnify for violating engagements unless they can thereby be restored to the benefits of them." Soon followed a conference between the plenipotentiaries, when the negotiations were brought to a halt, as no further progress could be had until other "powers" or "instructions," for the two words seem to have been used synonymously, were received from the first consul.

The French ministers had frequently mentioned the insuperable repugnance of their Government to surrender the claim to priority assured to it in the "commercial treaty of 1778," urging:

"The equivalent alleged to be accorded by France for this stipulation, the meritorious ground on which they generally represented the treaty stood, denying strenuously the power of the American Government to annul the treaties by a simple legislative act; and always concluding that it was perfectly incompatible with the honor and dignity of France to assent to the extinction of a right in favor of an enemy, and as much so to appear to acquiesce in the establishment of that right in favor of Great Britain. The priority with respect to the right of asylum for privateers and prizes was the only point in the old treaty on which they had anxiously insisted, and which they agreed could not be as well provided for by a new stipulation." (Doc. 102, p. 608.)

The American envoys (July 23, 1800), in answer to the French arguments, reducing to writing the substance of two conferences, said (Doc. 102, p. 612):

"As to the proposition of placing France, with respect to an asylum for privateers and prizes, upon the footing of equality with Great Britain, it was remarked that the right which had accrued to Great Britain in that respect was that of an asylum for her own privateers and prizes, to the exclusion of her enemies, wherefore it was physically impossible that her enemies should at the same time have a similar right. With regard to the observation that by the terms of the British treaty the rights of France were reserved, and therefore the rights of Great Britain existed with such limitation as would admit of both nations being placed on a footing which should be equal, it was observed by the envoys of the United States that the saving in the British treaty was only of the rights of France resulting from her then existing treaty, and that that treaty having ceased to exist the saving necessarily ceased also, and the rights which before that event were only contingent immediately attached and became operative."

Admission of the continuing force of the old treaties might involve admission of France's national claims, and in any event would put her ministers into a most advantageous position, giving them as consideration, to be surrendered at her pleasure in the new negotiation, what would then be a vested, existing, and acknowledged right to the guaranty, the alliance, and the use of our ports. Placed in this position, France would be without incentive to action. She would start in the discussion of a new treaty with more surrendered to her at the outset than she had hoped to obtain at the conclusion, and all that she afterwards gave up would be by way of generous concession. Whatever the law, whether the treaties were or were not abrogated by the act of Congress or the acts of parties, the American envoys were not permitted to admit the French contention, but were in duty bound to argue that the treaties were without continuing force. They followed this course, saying:

"A treaty being a mutual compact, a palpable violation of it by one party did, by the law of nature and of nations, leave it optional with the other to renounce and declare the same to be no longer obligatory. * * * The remaining party must decide whether there had been such violation on the other part as to justify its renunciation. For a wrong decision it would doubtless be responsible to the injured party, and might give cause for war; but even in such case, its act of public renunciation being an act within its competence would not be a void but a valid act, and other nations whose rights might thereby be beneficially affected would so regard it." (Doc. 102, p. 612.)

After further argument, they added that as it was the opinion of the French ministers that "it did not comport with the honor of France" to admit the American contentions, and at the same time be called upon for compensation, they offered "as their last effort" a proposition which suspended payment of compensation for spoliations "until France could be put into complete possession of the privileges she contended for, and at the same time they offered to give that security which a great pecuniary pledge would amount to for her having the privilege as soon as it could be given with good faith, which might perhaps be in a little more than two years; at any rate within seven." (Ibid., p. 612.)

The French answered (Doc. 102, p. 615) that they still found no reason to consider the treaties of 1778 as broken; the act of 1798, being that of one party, could not destroy, they said, "otherwise than by war and victory," that which was the engagement of two. After some further argument they wrote that they would not push further their observations, as—

"Those which they have repeated suffice to establish the rights of France, and to her the honor of a sacrifice which she would make in renouncing the exclusive right of entry into the ports of America for French privateers accompanied with their prizes." (Ibid., p. 615.)

As to the proposal of a money indemnity for delay they said:

"The proposition of the American ministers offers to the Republic at a distant time the hope of exclusive advantages, and for the present, and perhaps for seven years, an humiliating forfeiture of those rights, and a shameful inferiority with regard to a state [Great Britain] over which she had acquired these privileges by the services she had rendered to America when it made war with such state. When the ministers of France can subscribe to a condition unworthy the French nation the price which they would put upon their humiliation, would it not be the continuance of a subjection, which they consider to be contrary to the interest of the United States? The dependence of her ally can not be for her an indemnity for a national suffering. The French ministers believing it to be their duty to insist with their Government upon the immediate renunciation of a privilege well acquired, it would be contradictory that they should provide for its return at a distant time." (Ibid., pp. 615, 616.)

Some two weeks later the French again insisted that the treaties were not broken by the state of "misunderstanding" which had existed "through the acts of some agents rather than by the will of the respective governments" and which had not been a state of war, at least on the side of France. (Ibid., p. 616.)

Yet, after this opening, the ministers use language in apparent antagonism with the position thus and before advanced that the treaties were still existent; their tone towards the United States is marked by extreme bitterness, but they finish by consenting to an abolition of the treaties and the conclusion of a new one. The alternative proposition is thus put:

"Either the ancient treaties, with the privileges resulting from priority and the stipulation of reciprocal indemnities, or a new treaty, assuring equality without indemnity." (Ibid., p. 618.)

To the first of these proposals our ministers were forbidden to assent, as it involved an admission of the continuing force of the treaties; to the second they could not assent, for their first duty was to obtain indemnity. The time had come when they must go beyond their instructions and assume personal responsibility. (Doc. 102, pp. 619, 620.)

In August, after some delay and apparent friction, the Americans, saying that "while nothing would be more grateful to America than to acquit herself of any just claims of France, nothing could be more vain than an attempt to discourse to her reasons for the rejection of her own," made the following propositions (ibid., pp. 623-625):

"(1) Let it be declared that the former treaties are renewed and confirmed and shall have the same effect as if no misunderstanding between the two powers had intervened, except so far as they are derogated from by the present treaty.

"(2) It shall be optional with either party to pay to the other within seven years 3,000,000 of francs in money or securities which may be issued for indemnities, and thereby to reduce the rights of the other as to privateers and prizes to those of the most favored nation. And during the said term allowed for option the right of both parties shall be limited by the line of the most favored nation."

The third proposition looked to such modification of the mutual guaranty that military stores should be furnished by the one party to the value of 1,000,000 francs to the other when attacked, but either might within the seven years pay the lump sum of 5,000,000 francs to be freed from the obligation. The fifth proposition provided indemnities for individuals, and that "public ships taken on either side [should] be restored or paid for;" and the sixth that all property seized by either party and not yet "definitely condemned" should be restored on reasonable proof of it belonging to the other. So they finally agreed to recognize the existence of the treaties, the right of France to the guaranty and exclusive port privileges, and proposed to pay a lump sum to be free of their obligation in the future, for the propositions on this subject, while on their face mutual, were in effect for the benefit of the United States alone, France much prefering to revert to the statu quo.

Later during the negotiations an offer was made by us "to extinguish by an equivalent of 8,000,000 francs certain claims of France under the former treaties" (ibid., pp. 626 and 629); but even after all these concessions there was still no satisfactory promise of a result, although the existence of the treaties had in effect been recognized and "indemnity on either side in substance agreed to." The French now made a counter proposition continuing "the ancient treaties" "as if no misunderstanding had occurred," providing commissioners "to liquidate the respective losses," amending the article as to the use of ports by privateers, which was naturally a capital subject of difference, and providing that if after seven years the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the treaty of commerce were not re-established no indemnities should be paid, and, further, that the guaranty be converted into a "grant of succor for two millions" redeemable by a capital sum of ten millions. (Ibid., pp. 627, 628.)

The Americans made a counter proposal, renewing their offer of 8,000,000 francs to be paid within seven years in consideration that the United States "be forever exonerated of the obligation, on their part, to furnish succors or aid under the mutual guaranty," and that the rights of the French Republic be forever limited to those of the most favored nation. (Ibid., p. 629.) To this the French tersely answered (Ibid., p. 630):

"We shall have the right to take our prizes into our ports; a commission shall regulate the indemnities owed by either nation to the citizens of the other; the indemnities which shall be due by France to the citizens of the United States shall be paid for by the United States; in return for which France yields the exclusive privileges resulting from the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the treaty of commerce and "from the rights of the guaranty of the eleventh article of the treaty of alliance."

Matters now again reached a halting point; neither side would yield; France acknowledged her real object to be to avoid payment of indemnity; while the United States, on the other hand, could not assent to her views as to the guaranty and use of ports. In considerable heat the ministers parted. (Ibid., 632, 633.) The next day the Americans made another effort, because, as they wrote in their journal (ibid., p. 634), "being now convinced that the door was perfectly closed against all hope of obtaining indemnities with any modifications of the treaty, it only remained to be determined whether, under all circumstances, it would not be expedient to attempt a temporary arrangement which would extricate the United States from the war or that peculiar state of hostility in which they are at present involved, save the immense property of our citizens now pending before the council of prizes, and secure, as far as possible, our commerce against the abuses of capture during the present war;" therefore they proposed (ibid., 635) that as to the treaties and indemnities the question should be left open; that intercourse should be free; then, with suggestions as to property captured and not definitively condemned, and property which might thereafter be captured, they asked an early interview.

The French still insisted that a stipulation of indemnities involved an admission of the force of the treaties (ibid., pp. 935-637), and after argument proposed that the discussion of the indemnities, together with the discussion of article 11 of the treaty of alliance and articles 17 and 22 of the treaty of commerce, be postponed, but with the admission that the two treaties are "acknowledged and confirmed * * * as well as the consular convention of 1788;" that national ships and privateers be treated as those of the most favored nation; that national ships be restored and paid for, and that the "property of individuals not yet tried shall be so according to the treaty of amity and commerce of 1778, in consequence of which a rôle d'équipage shall not be exacted, nor any other proof which this treaty could not exact." So after months of negotiation the French ministers come back flat-footed upon the treaties as still existing, something which our representatives were forbidden by their instructions to admit. Nevertheless this proposal formed the text for discussion, and upon so slight a foundation was built the treaty of 1800.

After prolonged negotiation, and after striking out the word "provisional" in the name or description of the new treaty, the American commissioners signed it, although with great reluctance, "because they were profoundly convinced that, considering the relations of the two countries politically, the nature of our demands, the state of France, and the state of things in Europe, it was [their] duty, and for the honor and interest of the Government and people of the United States, that [they] should agree to the treaty rather than make none." (Ibid., p. 640.)

The vital effect of this negotiation as explanatory of the treaty of 1800, upon which the rights of these claimants are founded, explains the rehearsal of its details during which the so-called ultimatum of our Government was abandoned and the contention of the French Government as to the existence of the treaties was admitted.

Starting under their instructions, events had forced the ministers to offer unlimited recognition of the treaties of 1778, coupled with a pecuniary equivalent to extinguish in the future their most onerous provisions (ibid., 643); even this was not accepted, and the French, returning to their original ground, said that no indemnity could be granted unless the treaties were recognized without qualification as to the future, and this, they said, with the avowed object of avoiding the payment of indemnity. (Ibid.) The American ministers had then but two courses open to them, either to quit France, leaving the United States involved in a dangerous contest, or to propose a temporary arrangement, reserving for later adjustment points which could not then be satisfactorily settled. (Ibid., p. 644.) They elected the latter course, and the treaty signed at Paris the 30th day of Septembr, in the year 1800, by Ellsworth, Davie, and Murray, on the one hand, and J. Bonaparte, Fleurieu, and Roederer on the other, became part of the supreme law of the land, and was so proclaimed by the President upon the 21st day of December, 1801.

ASSUMPTION OF THE CLAIMS BY THE UNITED STATES.

But between its signature and proclamation a very important history intervened, one extremely interesting to the claimants at this bar, and which has been the cause of much argument and contention.

The compromise by our ministers, to which they were forced by the position of the French Government, was contained in the second article, which read:

"The ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties not being able to agree at present respecting the treaty of alliance of 6th February, 1778, the treaty of amity and commerce of the same date, and the convention of the 14th of November, 1788, nor upon the indemnities mutually due or claimed, the parties will negotiate further on these subjects at a convenient time, and until they may have agreed upon these points the said treaties and conventions shall have no operation, and the relations of the two countries shall be regulated as follows."

It is apparent that this article makes the treaty temporary and provisional in its nature. It admits that the existence or non-existence of the treaties of 1778, with the liabilities thereby imposed, is open to discussion, and that the indemnities are not provided for; that is, that the very first of the so-called "ultimata" of Secretary Pickering was temporarily abandoned. The Senate advised and consented to the ratification of the treaty, provided this article be expunged and in its place the following article be inserted:

"It is agreed that the present convention shall be in force for the term of eight years from the time of exchange of ratifications."

Napoleon thereupon consented (July 31, 1801) "to accept, ratify, and confirm" the convention, with an addition importing that it should be in force for the space of eight years, and with the retrenchment of the second article:

"Provided, That by this retrenchment the two states renounce the respective pretensions which are the object of the said article."

The ratifications were exchanged in Paris July 31, 1801. The treaty, with its addenda, was again submitted to the Senate, and in that form received the approval of that body (December 19, 1801), when it declared that it considered the convention "fully ratified," and returned it to the President for promulgation.

What the respective pretensions were which were the object of the second article does not admit of a shadow of doubt. On the one hand, the alleged continuing existence of the treaties incidentally involving national claims for past acts on our part and more particularly a right to future privileges; on the other hand, indemnity to our citizens for spoliations.

Our claims were good by the law of nations, and we had no need to turn back to the treaties for a foundation upon which to rest our arguments. Not so with France. Her national claims must necessarily rest on treaty provisions, and the future privileges she desired above all else could in no way be so easily or fully secured as by an admission of the continuing force of those instruments. She therefore insisted that for indemnity we must give treaty recognition. This we absolutely refused to do, and upon this rock twice did the negotiations split, only to be renewed by the patience and patriotism of our ministers. After months of weary discussion the parties stood as to this point exactly where they started, and to save their young and struggling country from further contest the American ministers consented to the compromise. Then the Senate struck the compromise out, and France said in effect, "Yes, we agree, if it is understood that we mutually renounce the pretensions which are the object of that article," to which the Senate and the President, by their official action, assented.

So died the treaties of 1778, with all the obligations which they imposed, and with them passed from the field of international contention the claims of American citizens for French spoliation.

In this whole transaction the treaties were urged on the one side against indemnities on the other. Admission of the continuing force of the treaties was the great desire of France to which she subordinated all else, even her national claims; on the other hand, the United States could by no possibility admit such a contention, for to do so would set them instantly at odds with their former enemy. Having given, in 1794, to Great Britain the exclusive port privileges secured to France in 1778, they could not in 1800 again reverse their policy, and, by returning these privileges to France, infringe their agreement with Great Britain.

Yet this was the issue, an issue never retreated from by the French; as they put it, "either the ancient treaties with indemnity [for spoliations] or a new treaty without indemnity." Article 2 of the treaty of 1800 still presents these counter propositions linked together when it postpones the discussion of the treaties, and at the same time postpones the discussion of the indemnities.

When the United States struck out that second article and assented to Napoleon's proviso that by so doing both states renounced the pretensions which were its object (that is, the treaties and these claims), the contract was complete. That there was a "bargain," to use Madison's word, is apparent from the instrument and the negotiations which have been recited as preceding it.

Four years later, Mr. Madison, then Secretary of State, instructed Mr. Pinckney, minister in Spain, that "the claims from which France were released were admitted by France, and the release was for a valuable consideration in a correspondent release of the United States from certain claims on them. The claims we make on Spain were never admitted by France nor made on France by the United States. They made, therefore, no part of the bargain with her, and could not be included in the release."

The counsel for defendants contends that Mr. Madison referred in this letter to "national" claims on the part of the United States for national injury, in the destruction of commerce, the increased cost of the Army and Navy, and the insult to the flag. It should be noted, in answer to this position, that the claims against Spain then under discussion, were exactly these claims now at bar, except that Spain was the party defendant instead of France. As against France captures made by French privateers under French decrees were taken into French ports and there condemned. As against Spain captures made by French privateers under French decrees were taken into Spanish ports and there condemned by French consuls under the authority and protection of Spain. Spain plead that these claims were settled by the second article of the treaty of 1800, and it was in answer to this plea that Mr. Madison wrote his letter.

The subject-matter of the instruction to Pinckney was these claims and nothing else, for we were not urging "national" claims on Spain, but the claims subsequently described in the Spanish treaty as those "on account of prizes made by French privateers and condemned by French consuls, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain." (Treaty of 1819, Article IX.) These claims were finally recognized, and paid through the Florida purchase. (Ibid., Art. XI; see also treaty of 1802.)

But the negotiations of the Ellsworth mission are conclusive that the claims were not "national" in the sense of governmental as opposed to individual. It is unnecessary to repeat extracts from the correspondence already given, and we need only refer to the project submitted by our ministers, the 18th of April

1800, which describes the claims as those "of divers merchants and other citizens of the United States" (Doc. 102, pp. 585–589), thus following their instructions, which called them "claims of our citizens." (Ibid., p. 575.)

Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State under the first two Presidents, and who, above all others, was familiar with the situation and with the rights of the parties, said that we bartered "the just claims of our merchants" to obtain a relinquishment of the French demand, and that—

"It would seem that the merchants have an equitable claim for indemnity from the United States. * * * The relinquishment by our Government having been made in consideration that the French Government relinquished its demand for a renewal of the old treaties, then it seems clear that, as our Government applied the merchants' property to buy off those old treaties, the sums so applied should be reimbursed." (Mr. Clayton's speech, 1846.)

Mr. Madison, as we have seen, said to Spain that the claims were admitted by France, and were released "for a valuable consideration," and he termed the transaction a "bargain."

Mr. Clay, in the Meade case, in which his opinion was given in 1821, five years prior to his report upon French spoliations, said that while a country might not be bound to go to war in support of the rights of its citizens, and while a treaty extinction of those rights is probably binding, it appears—

"That the rule of equity furnished by our Constitution, and which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, applies and entitles the injured citizen to consider his own country a substitute for the foreign power."

In this conclusion Chief-Justice Marshall strongly concurred, saying to Mr. Preston that—

"Having been connected with the events of the period and conversant with the circumstances under which the claims arose, he was, from his own knowledge, satisfied that there was the strongest obligation on the Government to compensate the sufferers by the French spoliations." (Clayton's speech, 1846.)

And he repeated to Mr. Leigh distinctly and positively "that the United States ought to make payment of these claims."

This view of the distinguished jurist and diplomatist is sustained by forty-five reports favorable to these claims, made in the Congress, against which stand but three adverse reports, all of which were made prior to the publication of the correspondence by Mr. Clay in 1826. Besides Marshall, Madison, Pickering, and Clay, the validity of the claims has been recognized by Clinton, Edward Livingston, Everett, Webster, Cushing, Choate, Sumner, and many other of the most distinguished statesmen known to American history, and while opponents have not been wanting, among the most eminent of whom were Forsyth, Calhoun, Polk, Pierce, Silas Wright, and Benton, still the vast weight of authority in the political division of the Government has been strenuous in favor of the contention made here by the claimants.

The judiciary has seldom occasion to deal with the abstract right of the citizen against his Government; for in a case raising such a question the individual is without remedy other than that granted by the legislature. The question of right, therefore, is usually passed upon by the political branch of the Government, leaving to the courts the power only to construe the amount and nature of the remedy given. Still judicial authority is not wanting in support of the position that by the agreement with France the United States became liable over to their individual citizens. Lord Truro laid down in the House of Lords as admitted law—

"That if the subject of a country is spoliated by a foreign Government he is entitled to redress through the means of his own Government. But if from weakness, timidity, or any other cause on the part of his own Government no redress is obtained from the foreign one, then he has a claim against his own country." (De Bode vs. The Queen 3 Clarke's House of Lords, p. 464.)

The same position is sustained by that eminent writer upon the public law, Vattel, who held that while the sovereign may dispose of either the person or the property of a subject by treaty with a foreign power, still, "as it is for the public advantage that he thus disposes of them, the State is bound to indemnify the citizens who are sufferers by the transaction." (Book 4, chap. 2.)

Napoleon, from his retirement in St. Helena, testified that by the suppression of the second article of the treaty of 1800 the privileges which France had possessed by the treaty of 1778 were ended, and the "just claims which America might have made for injuries done in time of peace" were annulled, adding that this was exactly what he had proposed to himself in fixing these two points "as equi-ponderating each other." (Gourgaud, Memoirs, vol. 2, p. 129.)

Finally, Senator Livingston, familiar with the whole subject as a contemporary, in his report upon it to the Senate, said:

"The committee think it sufficiently shown that the claim for indemnities was surrendered as an equivalent for the discharge of the United States from its heavy national obligations, and for the damages that were due for their preceding nonperformance of them. If so, can there be a doubt, independent of the constitutional provision, that the sufferers are entitled to indemnity? Under that provision, is not this right converted into one that we are under the most solemn obligations to satisfy? To lessen the public expenditure is a great legislative duty; to lessen it at the expense of justice, public faith, and constitutional right would be a crime. Conceiving that all these require that relief should be granted to the petitioners, they beg leave to bring in a bill for that purpose."

The word "national" has been largely used in argument in allusion to the different kinds of claims at different periods brought into the discussion, and is a convenient word if clearly understood in the connection in which it is used. All claims are "national" in the sense of the jus gentium, for no nation deals as to questions of tort with an alien individual; the rights of that individual are against his Government, and not until that Government has undertaken to urge his claim—not until that Government has approved it as at least prima facie valid—does it become a matter of international contention; then, by adoption, it is the claim of the nation, and as such only is it regarded by the other country.

The name of the individual claimant may be used as a convenient designation of the particular discussion, but as between the nations it is never his individual claim, but the claim of his Government founded upon injury to its citizen. Nations negotiate and settle with nations; individuals have relations only with their own governments. Other claims, sometimes the subject of argument, rest upon injury to the State as a whole; of these an apt illustration is found in the so-called "indirect" claims against Great Britain, disposed of in the arbitration of 1872, and in the claims advanced by France for injury caused by noncompliance with the treaties of 1778.

Thus, while all claims urged by one nation upon another are, technically speaking, "national," it is convenient to use colloquially the words "national" and "individual" as distinguishing claims founded upon injury to the whole people from those founded upon injury to particular citizens. Using the words in this sense, it appears that in the negotiations prior to the treaty of 1800, and in effect in the instrument itself, national claims were advanced by France against individual claims advanced by the United States. France urged that she had been wronged as a nation; we urged that our citizens' rights had been invaded. If "national" claims had been used against "national" claims, and the one class had been set off against the other in the compromise, of course the agreement would have been final in every way, as the surrender and the consideration therefor would have been national, and no rights between the individual and his own Government could have complicated the matter.

But in the negotiation of 1800 we used "individual" claims against "national" claims, and the set-off was of French national claims against American individual claims. That any government has the right to do this, as it has the right to refuse war in protection of a wronged citizen, or to take other action which, at the expense of the individual, is most beneficial to the whole people, is too clear for discussion. Nevertheless, the citizen whose property is thus sacrificed for the safety and welfare of his country has his claim against that country; he has a right to compensation, which exists even if no remedy in the courts or elsewhere is given him. A right often exists where there is no remedy, and a most frequent illustration of this is found in the relation of the subject to his sovereign, the citizen to his government.

It seems to us that this "bargain" (again using Madison's word), by which the present peace and quiet of the United States, as well as their future prosperity and greatness, were largely secured, and which was brought about by the sacrifice of the interests of individual citizens, falls within the intent and meaning of the Constitution, which prohibits the taking of private property for public use without just compensation. We do not say that for all purposes these claims were "property" in the ordinarily-accepted and in the legal sense of the word; but they were rights which had value, a value inchoate, to be sure, and entirely dependent upon adoption and enforcement by the Government, but an actual money value capable of ascertainment the moment the Government had adopted them and promised to enforce them, as it did in August, 1793, and constantly thereafter. That the use to which the claims were put was a public use can not admit of a doubt, for it solved the problem of strained relations with France and forever put out of existence the treaties of 1778, which formed an insuperable obstacle to our advance in paths of peace to the achievement of commercial greatness.

TREATY OF 1803.

The defendants urge further that the treaty of 1803 finally disposed of all pretensions of citizens of the United States in regard to these spoliations.

One of the principal objects of this treaty is found in the instructions to Mr. Livingston, our minister, wherein the Secretary of State directed his particular attention to claims embraced in the fourth article of the treaty of 1800, describing them as arising from: "(1) Cases of capture wherein no judicial proceedings have been had; (2) cases carried before French tribunals, and not definitively decided on the 30th September, 1800; (3) captures made subsequent to that date." (Madison to Livingston, September 28, 1801, Doc. 102, p. 701.)

Accordingly Mr. Livingston, in January following, complained to the French Government of infractions of the existing treaty (of 1800) in relation to "vessels taken after its signature," "vessels previously taken where no judicial proceedings had been had," "vessels on which no definitive sentence had been given before that day," or which were removable to the council of prizes; these are fourth-article claims embraced in the modus vivendi therein provided. Claims for vessels which were to have been restored are clearly not claims which had matured prior to September 30, 1800, when the treaty was signed. (Ibid., p. 704.)

In the next month (February 24, 1802) Mr. Livingston speaks of the differences as "debts," about which he must transmit to his Government a statement of the measures about to be adopted by France, "with a view either to afford it the satisfaction that it will always feel in contributing to the interests of France * * * or of putting a stop to credits that must be ruinous to its citizens already suffering under heavy losses sustained by the detention of a considerable capital in the hands of the French Government." (Ibid., 708.) It is thus apparent that these claims, in the view of the negotiator, rested substantially on contract, and it is further apparent from the text of the note that these contracts were for supplies to the French fleets and armies.

This is the first subject of negotiation; the second is as to the council of prizes, about which there were "daily complaints of their entire disregard of the treaty," so much so that when a vessel was ordered restored it was sent back in a damaged state and charged with cost of "detention, storage, etc." Fourth-article claims these, as we have already seen.

Livingston later (April 17, 1802), in discussing the fifth and second articles of the treaty of 1800, says:

"The fifth article expressly stipulates that all debts due by either Government to the individuals of the other shall be paid, but as this would also have included the indemnities for captures and condemnations previously made, and it was the intention of the contracting parties, by the second article, to preclude this payment as depending on a future negotiation, it was necessary to except from this promise of payment all that made the subject of the second article. * * * On its [the second article] being erased, the fifth article stands alone as a promise to pay, with the single exception of indemnities for captures and condemnations." (Ibid., 717.)

And he adds that so far as relates to indemnities for captures and condemnations which had been made previous to the signature of the treaty his demands could not be supported.

It seems hardly necessary to quote further from the correspondence, which shows that Mr. Livingston not only never had in mind, but expressly excluded second-article claims, directing his attention first to debts, "confirmed by treaty," as he says (ibid., 729), and second, to vessels seized during or after the negotiation of the treaty of 1800; that is, claims "confirmed," to use his word, by that treaty's fourth and fifth articles.

The distinction between different classes of claims then existing between the United States and France must be clearly marked out before the treaty of 1803 can be properly understood. The second article of the treaty of 1800 covered claims for illegal seizures and condemnations which were tied to the treaties of 1778. But all the illegal captures were not covered by that second article, for the fourth article treated of others; that is, of "property captured, and not yet definitely condemned, or which may be captured before the exchange of ratifications;" and this property, it was agreed, should be restored; that is, while the negotiations of the Ellsworth mission were proceeding the French decrees remained in force and spoliations had not stopped; the cases of some seized American vessels were then pending before the French tribunals, and these were the ones to be restored if not "definitely condemned" by the time the treaty became a law; others might be seized pending the discussion and before exchange of ratifications, in fact such seizures were made, and these also were to be restored.

Additional proof that this fourth article was in effect a mere modus vivendi is found in its concluding paragraph, which provides that it shall take effect from the date of signature, not from the exchange of ratifications, and that if any property should be condemned—that is, condemned in the future—before knowledge of the stipulation "shall be obtained, the property shall without delay be restored or paid for."

Now, the property covered by this article, to wit, that then before the tribunals, or which might thereafter come before the tribunals before the new treaty took effect, never was restored or paid for, although spoliations continued for some time. It is important here to note the distinction between the position as against the French Government, of cases pending during the negotiation or which might thereafter arise, and that now before this court wherein the condemnation had occurred before.

This case and those like it were "claims to indemnity" merely; the property had disappeared and could not be restored, the French tribunals had definitively acted and payment for it would be made only upon admission by the United States of the continuing force of the ancient treaties; while, as to then pending cases the property could be restored, or in case of mistaken sale its value could be easily and immediately ascertained, and the fourth article absolutely promised restoration of payment.

The agreement of 1803 is contained in three instruments forming the contract by which we acquired Louisiana; they give no rights to these claimants, as is popularly supposed; on the contrary, it is contended by the Government that any rights which ever existed were destroyed by them. The third treaty providing for the payment of "sums due by France to the citizens of the United States" is the only one bearing upon these cases.

Article I provides that these "sums" called "debts" contracted before September 30, 1800 (the date of the prior treaty), shall be paid, with interest.

Article II describes the debts as those set forth in an annexed conjectural note, which is a list of claims allowed by the French accounting officers for such articles as rice, flour, salt, beef, cloth, leather, cotton, and indigo, wines and spirits; while Article IV limits the preceding articles to debts still due American citizens yet creditors of France "for supplies, for embargoes, and prizes made at sea in which the appeal has been properly lodged within the time mentioned in the convention" of 1800. But there is no such time mentioned in that convention, nor is there a word in it looking to any appeal whatever from decisions of inferior tribunals; the only provision about prizes in that treaty is that contained in its fourth article, directing that in the future they be restored.

Proceeding now to Article V of this somewhat mysterious instrument of 1803, we find another limitation upon the preceding articles, to wit, that they shall cover only captures wherein the council of prizes has ordered restitution if the claim was valid against France, and then only in case of "insufficiency of the captors," i. e., that the privateer's bond was not good. Further, it shall apply to debts mentioned in the fifth article of the treaty of 1800; that is, "debts" (not claims for damage by tort) due by one nation to citizens of the other, and this fifth article of 1800 expressly bars claims for captures or confiscations, while the fifth article of 1803 expressly does not comprehend "prizes whose condemnation has been or shall be confirmed." Therefore, by these series of limitations, the scope of the treaty of 1803 is confined on its face, and so far as the cases at bar are interested in it, "to captures, of which the council of prizes shall have ordered restitution," provided the claim was a valid one, and the captor insufficient. Really, there does not seem to be very much left of it, so far as "embargoes and prizes made at sea" (Article IV) are concerned.

The significant fact is stated to us by counsel in this connection that there were presented to the commission formed under the treaty of 1831, which we shall soon have occasion to examine, claims for four vessels, the Dominick Terry, the Nancy, the Nathaniel, and the Traveller, taken between September 30, 1800, and July 31, 1801, and not paid for. These claims were rejected because the vessels were captured before July 31, 1801, the date when ratifications of the treaty of 1800 were exchanged. Further, the report of the board under the treaty of 1803 shows that only eight captures at sea were allowed, a ridiculously small number if the class of claims now at bar were within the jurisdiction of that tribunal.

That the settlement and payment of "debts," not of claims for tort, was the primary object of the treaty of 1803 is explained in its preamble and is apparent from its text, while the treaty of 1800 dealt with torts and indemnities for wrongs committed upon our commerce. The claim for debts was not sacrificed by the treaty of 1800, but kept alive by the fifth article, which, in further proof of the abandonment of claims for tort, explicitly excepted from the benefits of its provisions all "indemnities claimed on account of captures and confiscations." But these "debts contracted by one of the two nations with individuals of the other" were not paid as the treaty of 1800 promised, nor, as Mr. Livingston said to the French Government in 1802, was there the most "distant hope of their payment." (Doc. 102, p. 714.)

The association of the second and fifth articles of the treaty of 1800 in the preamble of the treaty of 1803 has been deemed significant as showing an intention to revive and settle the second-article claims now commonly known as "spoliation" claims, whereas the allusion was intended to reaffirm the exclusion of these claims already made by the second article; for the fifth article (1800) includes "debts" which are to be settled and expressly excludes "indemnities;" that is, excludes the subject-matter of the second article, which was not to be settled; so that France, being desirous in 1803, as the preamble says, "in compliance with the second and fifth articles of the convention of 1800 to secure the payment of the sums due by France to the citizens of the United States," covenanted to pay "debts," not indemnity for torts other than those specified, and which had been turned into debts by the fourth article of the treaty of 1800.

To put it in another form: as the original second article had ceased to exist, and was replaced by a provision that the treaty should last eight years, of course a reference to this new second article in the treaty of 1803 would have been absurd; so we must conclude that the negotiators referred to the original second article, the article which had been expunged by agreement. That article, so far as claims of citizens were concerned, referred to torts and nothing else; the fifth article referred to "debts," and provided that payment should be made therefor; and then went on to make an express exclusion from its benefits of claims for captures and confiscations, that is, claims arising from torts which were covered by the second article as it then stood. What more natural than that, in rehearsing the objects of the treaty of 1803, the two articles should be brought together in the preamble, the fifth article as embracing the debts due and the second article as covering the express exception made in the fifth article, which "includes debts contracted," and excludes "indemnities claimed on account of captures and confiscations?" The language of the preamble is, therefore, in compliance with the second as well as with the fifth articles of the treaty of 1800.

We are of opinion that the treaty of 1803 had no reference to the claims embraced in the second article of the treaty of 1800.

CREW LIST.

Turning to the particular case now on trial we consider it with the principle admitted that the claims popularly known as "French spoliation claims" were, as a class, and if embraced in the description of the second article of the treaty of 1800, valid claims against France, which were surrendered by our Government for the valuable consideration found in a release from the obligations of the treaties of 1778, and that, by this action, the Government of the United States assumed the liabilities of France in regard to them, and is in duty bound to recompense the individuals who suffered loss by the illegal captures and condemnations.

The findings show that the schooner Sally, owned by Americans, commanded by an American, and laden with an American cargo, while on a commercial voyage from Massachusetts to Spain, was, on the 5th day of June, 1797, seized by the French privateer Intrépide, taken to the port of Nantes, there condemned by a French tribunal, and "confiscated" for the benefit of the privateer. It was not alleged that she had violated the law of nations, either by attempting a blockade or by carrying contraband, or in any other manner, but that she had violated a local French municipal regulation "concerning the navigation of neutrals." It appears upon the face of the decree that the Government of France, through laws passed by its own legislature, valid within its territorial jurisdiction and upon its own ships, but not elsewhere, attempted to regulate the conduct of neutral merchantmen upon the high seas, where they were subject only to the laws of their own country and that law of abstract right and justice which by mutual consent has become crystallized into the law of nations.

To learn wherein the schooner violated the French decree we must turn to the findings, which rehearse the judgment of the tribunal, as follows:

"That while the master may be correct in the sum total of his clearance papers he is flagrantly at fault as to his crew-list," and "considering that the obligation common to the French nation and to the United States, and which constitutes the safety of their respective navigation, is defined by the treaty of February 6, 1778, which decides, articles 25 and 27, that every captain who receives a passport must be provided with a list, signed and attested by witnesses, containing the names and surnames and place of birth and residence of the persons composing the crew of his ship and of all persons embarking upon her, which he will not receive without the knowledge and permission of the naval officers.

"Considering that the memorandum or crew-list fulfills none of these formalities, inasmuch as it is unsigned, that the places of birth and residence of the men composing the crew are not declared, and the permission of the naval officer is not given; considering that article 6 of section 7 of the marine regulations of 1781 declares to be lawful prize the cargoes of confiscated ships," and "considering finally that article 4 of the decree of the executive directory of the 12th Ventose, year 5, is clear and precise, and that it declares to be a good and lawful prize every American ship which shall not have a crew-list in due form such as is described by the model annexed to the treaty of February 6, 1778," therefore the court, in conformity with these laws, and especially with article 4 of the said decree, declared valid the capture of the Sally and her cargo, and declared the captain to belong to "the enemies of the republic" because he did not have a crew-list in conformity with the French decree.

The vessel and cargo were confiscated because the crew-list, the "rôle d'équipage," was not in form, although there is not a word or sentence, as the French afterwards admitted (Doc. 102, p. 637), in the treaties of 1778 requiring any such document. The French decree required it, but we can not admit that the government of a foreign country may stretch its arm over the ocean, and, seizing an American vessel, direct it as to the papers it shall carry, under penalty of confiscation. There is no allegation in the proceeding that the Sally did not have all the papers, other than this crew-list, required by the treaty of 1778 and the laws of the United States. In fact, the court itself admits this in saying that the captain is correct "in the sum total of his clearance papers, * * * but flagrantly in fault as to his crew-list." How flagrantly at fault? He had complied with the laws of his country, he had not violated a provision of the treaties of 1778, and it is not hinted that he infringed the law of nations or intended to do so.

The confiscation rests upon the decree of March 2, 1797, authorizing the seizure and condemnation of every American vessel not having on board "a rôle d'équipage, in proper form, such as is prescribed by the model annexed to the treaty of the 6th of February, 1778." A "rôle d'équipage" is for all practical purposes a "crew-list," although technically, under French regulations, it contains the names of all on board, including the passengers. Still "crew-list" is a sufficient translation for the purposes of this case.

The treaty of 1778 required vessels of each party to be furnished with a passport and a certificate as to her cargo and destination, but no mention whatever is made of a crew-list. Seizures on account of the lack of this instrument were, however, made even before the decree of March, 1797, and our consul-general, in calling attention to this fact, said to the minister of foreign affairs (February 23, 1797, ibid., p. 155):

"By no regulations of the United States are our ships subjected to this formality; and not one of our vessels has (rôle d'équipage) a crew-list thus countersigned. Moreover, in the different treaties and conventions that connect France with America there is not found a single article sufficient to justify the doctrine set forth by the privateer. * * * I consider it unnecessary for me to communicate on this subject the right and supreme law of nations, being persuaded that you will think with me that every free and independent nation should possess the exclusive right to establish regulations for the management of their own navigation; and that no nation possesses the right to subject the citizens of another power to formalities to be observed in a foreign country not exacted by the laws of said country or by to those to which said citizens belong. * * * The principle which the captain [of the privateer] desires to see established would lead to the condemnation of all the ships belonging to my nation actually found in the different ports of France, under the faith of treaties, and to authorize the cruisers of the Republic to capture all our merchantmen."

Mr. Pinckney afterwards (May 15, 1797, ibid., p. 171) writes:

"Our papers are, as they ought to be, according to the maritime laws of our country."

And again (June 28, 1797, ibid., p. 176):

"Mr. Adet [the French minister] arrived at Havre in an American ship without a rôle d'équipage. The Courrier Maritime du Havre * * * infers that Mr. Adet must have been convinced, with all other publicists, that a rôle d'équipage was not necessary, and that all that was requisite was a passport conformable to the model annexed to the treaty of 1778."

Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of State, wrote the next year (December 13, 1798, ibid., p. 429):

"There is no shadow of foundation for the claims set up by the French Government of the necessity of our vessels being provided with a rôle d'équipage."

In default of express treaty provision no Government can prescribe to our merchantmen navigating the high seas, the detailed form and number of the papers they are to carry, nor seize or confiscate those merchantmen for noncompliance with that nation's municipal statutes. The seizure of this vessel, and of others under like conditions, was clearly illegal and unjustifiable.

PRIZE COURTS.

The defendants say, further, the condemnation can not be illegal because made by a prize court having jurisdiction, and the decisions of such courts are final and binding. This proposition is of course admitted so far as the res is concerned; the decision of the court, as to that, is undoubtedly final, and vests good title in the purchaser at the sale; not so as to the diplomatic claim, for that claim has its very foundation in the judicial decision, and its validity depends upon the justice of the court's proceedings and conclusion. It is an elementary doctrine of diplomacy that the citizen must exhaust his remedy in the local courts before he can fall back upon his Government for diplomatic redress; he must then present such a case as will authorize that Government to urge that there has been a failure of justice.

The diplomatic claim, therefore, is based not so much upon the original wrong upon which the court decided, as upon the action and conclusion of the court itself, and, diplomatically speaking, there is no claim until the courts have decided. That decision, then, is not only not final, but, on the contrary, is the beginning, the very corner-stone, of the international controversy. This leads us naturally to another point made by the defense, in that the claimant did not "exhaust his remedy" because he did not prosecute an appeal. We, of course, admit that usually there is no foundation for diplomatic action until a case cognizable by the local courts is prosecuted to that of last resort; but this doctrine involves the admission that there are courts freely open to the claimant, and that he is unhampered in the protection of his rights therein, including his right of appeal. It is within the knowledge of every casual reader of the history of the time that no such condition of affairs, in fact, then existed.

The very valuable report of Mr. Broadhead shows that prior to March 27, 1800, there was no appeal except to the department of the Loire-Inférieure, and in the then existing state of bad feeling and modified hostilities, and under the surrounding circumstances, this was to the captains of the seized vessels, in most if not in all cases, a physical impossibility. Nor prior to the agreement of 1800 was there any practical reason for appealing to a court when the result, as our seamen believed, whether rightly or not, but still honestly, was a foregone conclusion, and while negotiations were progressing for a settlement; nor is there anything in these negotiations showing that a technical exhaustion of legal remedy would be required. We are of opinion that the claimant was not, under these purely exceptional circumstances, obliged to prosecute his case through the highest court, even if he could have done so, which we doubt.

TREATIES OF 1819 AND 1831.

This court is forbidden by the act conferring jurisdiction not only to examine claims embraced in the treaty of 1803, which we have considered, but also those allowed and paid in whole or in part under the treaty of 1819 with Spain and those allowed in whole or in part under the treaty of 1831 with France.

The reference heretofore made in this opinion to the Spanish treaty is sufficient to show its inapplicability to vessels seized on the high seas by a French privateer, taken to a French port and there illegally condemned and confiscated; so that treaty may be thrown out of the consideration of this case.

The treaty of 1831 is a claims treaty, by which the French Government, "in order to liberate itself completely from all the reclamations preferred against citizens of the United States for unlawful seizures, captures, sequestrations, confiscations, or destructions of their vessels, cargoes, or other property," agreed to pay 25,000,000 francs to the United States for distribution (Article I), while the United States on their part agreed to pay to France for claims, described in language somewhat similar, the sum of 1,500,000 francs (Article III). As to other claims each country opened its courts to the citizens of the other, and finally France abandoned its demands under the eighth article of the Louisiana treaty in return for a reduction of duties upon French wines.

The wording of this treaty is broad enough at first glance to sustain the defendants' contention that these claims are included in it; but treaties and statutes, like every other document, must be read in the light of the facts as they existed at the time. A treaty now made with Great Britain providing a settlement of "all claims" could not be held to reopen the proceedings of the Geneva arbitration and to authorize payment of claims there dismissed, for the award was final, both as to what was allowed and as to what was refused. Nor could a similar general convention with France permit an opening of the proceedings of the Franco-American Commission with possible payment of claims there refused and declared forever barred.

Such treaties look not to dead issues, but to living, pending claims, forming at the time a subject of contention between the Governments, and not to those universally regarded as finally settled. Claims of the class of the one at bar had been disposed of in 1801, when the President and Senate concurred in Napoleon's stipulation as to the second article, and since that time, although they had been constantly pressed upon the United States as an obligation of that Government to its citizens, they nowhere appear as a subject of discussion between the nations. France, by the treaty of 1831, desired to liberate itself from claims "preferred against it" by citizens of the United States, but these spoliation claims were not then being preferred against it; on the contrary, since 1801 the claimants had turned their attention exclusively to the United States, recognizing the force and effect of what was called the "retrenchment of the second article." The French Government clearly understood this treaty of 1831 as excluding all American claims of every description originating prior to the treaties of 1803. (Ex. Doc., 22d Cong., 2d sess., No. 147, p. 165.)

Our commissioners who distributed the fund also so understood it, and required every claimant to show that his "claim remained unimpaired and in full force against France" in 1831. (Ex. Doc. H. R., Twenty-fourth Congress, first session, No. 117, p. 4.) But these spoliation claims had not only been impaired but destroyed as a French obligation by the treaty of 1800. One hundred and five cases of captures made prior to September 30, 1800, were presented to the board and rejected.

A broad distinction is made in the remedial statute (January 20, 1885), between the claims described in these different treaties of 1803, 1819, and 1831. As to the treaty of 1803 the act does not extend to claims "embraced" in its provisions; as to the treaty of 1819 the act does not extend to claims "allowed and paid in whole or in part" under its provisions; as to the treaty of 1831 the act does not extend to claims "allowed in whole or in part" under its provisions. It is not contended that this claim was "allowed in whole or in part" under the provisions of the treaty of 1831.

ABROGATION OF TREATIES OF 1778.

We have not considered the point that the treaties of 1778 were abrogated by the act of Congress passed in 1798. That question, which the ablest minds of the period were unable to solve, and which proved an ever present and enduring obstacle to all negotiation until forcibly removed by Napoleon, with our concurrence, we fortunately are not forced to deal with. The rights of this claimant rest upon no convention, but are founded upon international law. Treaty or no treaty, a foreign nation can not be permitted to confiscate an American merchantman engaged in legitimate commerce upon the high seas because his crew-list does not fulfill the requirements of that nation's local ordinances.

That the act of Congress was binding within the jurisdiction of the United States and was necessarily to be so regarded by our courts does not now admit of question. The treaties were, however, not only part of the supreme law of the land wherein they were replaced, within the jurisdiction of the Constitution, by a later supreme law, to wit, a statute; but they were also, as between the two republics, contracts, which one of the parties attempted to annul. Treaties containing no clause fixing their duration are, under certain circumstances, voidable at the option of one party; whether there existed in 1798 such circumstances as authorized and made valid an abrogation of the treaties of 1778 by the United States was the very question left unsettled by the treaty of 1800, the one question upon which by no possibility apparently could the parties agree.

For the same reason we find it unnecessary to examine how far the French violated the agreement by their treaty of 1786 with Great Britain (15 Martens Recueil de Traités, 2d edition, vol. 4, p. 155), or the effect, by way of abrogation of these agreements, of the Jay treaty, or the change in the form of government in France.

TITLE.

Some argument has been made as to the ownership of this claim, based upon the provision of the statute that the court shall determine "the present ownership, and if by assignee, the date of the assignment, with the consideration paid therefor." (Sec. 3.)

Whatever may have been the intention of Congress in inserting this provision, its terms are perfectly clear; the findings of fact show in this case that the claimant is the administrator with the will annexed of the owner of the Sally, and show all other facts necessary to a decision upon the subject, except as to one of the defendant's points; as to this we can not agree that Congress intended this court to perform what is in effect a physical impossibility and to throw upon us the task of probate courts in the investigation of the rights of thousands of descendants and devisees of the original claimants, who are now scattered, in all human probability, to the four quarters of the globe. To ask this court to go back to the year 1800 and follow from that time down the succession of every then existing claimant is to ask us to do that which under our jurisdiction and powers would be an impossibility.

A much more reasonable interpretation of the act appears upon its face, and applying that interpretation to this case we have found that the claimant, as administrator of the owner of the schooner Sally, is the owner of the claim. We consider it no part of our duty under the statute to place ourselves in the position of a court of probate and report to Congress the manner in which any ultimate recovery should under the laws of the thirty-eight States and eight Territories of this Union be distributed among the numerous next of kin or devisees of the original claimants and their descendants. The administrators are officers of those probate courts subject to their jurisdiction and control, and presumably have filed adequate bonds for the honest and proper performance of the trust reposed in them.

Congress asks us for two facts: First, the present ownership. The owner, both in law and equity, the Supreme Court has said, is the administrator (Villelonga's case, 23 Wal., p. 35), and that suffices for this particular case. Secondly, Congress asks, where there has been an assignment, not only the name of the present owner, but the date of the assignment and the consideration paid therefor. Of course these facts will be reported when such a case is presented.

So we reach the end of this opinion as unlike the usual judicial expression in its form and supporting authorities as are the cases before us unlike those ordinarily submitted to a tribunal of the law. We are, however, for the moment invested with some of the powers and jurisdiction belonging to the political branch of the Government, and upon us is imposed an examination not usually or naturally committed to a judicial body. We have been required not to investigate legal rights, based upon the doctrines and principles of the common law, but to inquire into and to report upon the ethical rights of a citizen against his Government; rights which are never enforceable except by the consent of the sovereign—in this country the legislature—as whose substitute we act to the limited extent prescribed and marked out by the remedial statute.

The result which we have reached is supported by resolutions passed in each of the thirteen original States, by twenty-four reports made to the Senate by its committees, by over twenty similar reports made to the House of Representatives, by the fact that while three adverse reports have been made, one to the Senate and two to the House, no adverse report has been made in either body since the publication of the correspondence in 1826, and by the further facts that the Senate has passed eight bills in favor of these claimants, and the House has passed three of these, of which one is the present law, the other two having been vetoed, one by President Polk, substantially upon grounds not at this time important; the other by President Pierce for reasons which we have considered very fully in this opinion, and with which, after the most careful and painstaking consideration, we can not agree.

The arguments of counsel for claimant, marked as they were by ability, industry, and a frank desire for a just ascertainment of the rights involved, have been of great assistance to us; while the learned assistant attorney for the United States has presented the defense with a zeal and force of argument which we do not find in the history of the long discussions it has heretofore received.

The Chief-Justice and all the judges concur in this opinion, and we shall, in accordance with the statute, report to Congress the conclusions of fact and law in this claim, together with a copy of this opinion, which contains (using the words of the statute) the conclusions which, in our judgment, affect the liability of the United States therefor.

No. 505.—George Holbrook, administrator de bonis non, estate of Edward Holbrook, deceased, vs. The United States.

Nos. 249 and 252.—Charles Francis Adams, administrator de bonis non, estate of Peter C. Brooks, deceased, vs. The United States.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendants demur generally in these cases upon the ground that the petitions do not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and they also move to strike out certain evidence as inadmissible. The argument, which was very general in its nature, has proceeded upon the understanding that the details of each case are to be considered at a later stage of the proceedings. It is unusual for general principles to be presented in a particular case when the case itself is not to abide the result reached by the court, yet, in view of the novelty of these claims, their age, their number, the peculiar jurisdiction conferred by the remedial statute, and in view of the importance to counsel of some light from the court in aid of the novel responsibilities cast upon them, we think it our duty to somewhat overstep the usual forms of judicial procedure in support of substantial right and justice.

Three cases are presented together—one on behalf of the owners of the schooner Delight, the other two on behalf of the insurer of the vessel and cargo.

The demurrer applies to all of these. Taking the petition of the owner's administrator as a model upon which to discuss the general question of form, we find it alleges the Delight to have been a duly registered vessel of the United States; that the claimant is, and his intestate was, a citizen of the United States; that the schooner sailed from Boston for Saint Bartholomew's, and during the prosecution of her voyage was "illegally captured on or about the 19th day of July, 1799, by a French privateer called the Courageuse," and, with her cargo, condemned as prize at Guadeloupe by a French tribunal, in violation of the law of nations and the treaties between the United States and France.

In considering the demurrer to this petition it must be remembered that we are not here to enter judgment under this act, but to advise Congress; to report to that body our conclusions of fact and law. In performance of this duty we do not feel authorized to throw a case out of court because of some technical defect in form not going to the merits, and which may be remedied without injury to the defendants.

It is urged that the use of the word "illegally" before the word "captured" is bad pleading, as involving a conclusion of law. This point may be passed with the observation that in our opinion the word is at most mere surplusage. The averment that the vessel was seized by a French privateer during a commercial voyage, at a date when, as we have heretofore held, this nation was at peace with France, and that she was afterwards condemned, is sufficient allegation of illegality in the capture.

We are not quite so clear about the averment of place of seizure, which it is urged should affirmatively appear as upon the high seas, and at this early stage do not think it advisable to announce any opinion as to the presumption contended for by the claimants that a vessel prosecuting a voyage across the ocean, and seized during that voyage, is seized upon the high seas.

Should future argument show this point to be important, the claimant will have leave to amend in accordance with the facts developed. We conclude the petition to be sufficient in form, and the argument made for the defense as to the validity of claims of this class against France and their assumption by the United States having been fully considered in the case of William Gray, administrator, decided after the argument of the case at bar, we overrule the demurrer upon these points.

There remain to be considered in this connection the position and rights of insurers. One of the petitions alleges that Brooks, as agent of underwriters, insured the Delight against loss "from dangers of the sea, fires, enemies, pirates, assailing thieves, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation and quality soever, barratry of the master, and of the mariner and all other losses and misfortunes that have or shall come" to the vessel, and alleges further that insurance was paid after capture, that said Brooks repaid to each underwriter the amount underwritten by him, receiving in return an assignment of all the interest of such underwriter.

The other important allegations, such as those concerning ownership and condemnation, are substantially the same as in the owner's petition.

The only interest the Government appears to have in a question of this kind is that there shall not be a double payment or an overpayment on account of any one loss, so that in effect we have but to solve the rights of the owners and insurers as between themselves, which are determined by principles of insurance law already well settled by the courts.

Insurance is a contract whose object is indemnity, for which the consideration received by the insurer is twofold: first, his premium; second, his hope of recovery should a loss occur, his spes recuperandi.

This hope can not exist unless there is a reasonable prospect of some recovery. It can not exist where a vessel has sunk at sea, but it does exist where a vessel is simply stranded but not become a total wreck, "where any part of the property exists in specie, * * * as when the vessel is stranded and still alive." Where something may be possibly saved, the owner claiming absolute loss must "abandon" to the insurer, relinquishing thereby all his rights to any possible future recovery from the thing insured. Abandonment is always based upon the existence of some hope of recovery, and where the hope does not exist it is an unnecessary form.

When abandonment is made and the insurance paid the insurer stands in the place of the insured, and is entitled to all the advantages resulting from that situation, and this right relates back to the loss. (Park on Ins., 143; 1 Wash., C. C., 443; 12 Peters, 378; 1 Sumner, 328 and 400; Phillips on Ins., 1707; 2 Parsons on Marine Ins., 194; 104 Mass., 107; 12 Pick., 348.)

"When a total loss has been paid there passes to the insurer not only what remains of the ship in a material form, but likewise all rights incident to the property of whatever kind. When a loss of any kind, whether total or partial, has been paid the insurer so far stands in the place of the assured that he is entitled to recover whatever compensation for the loss the assured may be able to recover from any third party." (Lowndes, Marine Insurance, 223; Phillips on Ins., secs. 1712 and 1723.)

The Supreme Court supports this doctrine, saying it is a mistake to assert that the right of a marine insurer to proceed against a carrier after payment of total loss "grows wholly or even principally out of any abandonment; payment of a total loss without abandonment being sufficient to vest in the insurer the rights of the insured" (Hall and Long vs. Railroad Company, 13 Wall., 367); while Phillips states the rule to be that "a mere payment of a loss, whether partial or total, gives the insurers an equitable title to what may be afterwards recovered from other parties on account of the loss. The effect of a payment of a loss is equivalent in this respect to that of an abandonment." (Sec. 1723.)

In capture and condemnation there can be no spes recuperandi, for the vessel, so far as the owners are concerned, has disappeared, and there exists no reasonable prospect that anything will at any time be recovered. "There is no existing hope," to use Chancellor Kent's language, "of recovery in this case [of capture], * * * and an abandonment * * * would have been as idle as if the property had perished at sea" (Gracie vs. The N. Y. Ins. Co., 8 Johnson, 245), and since the time of Lord Mansfield the capture of a neutral merchantman upon the high seas, especially when followed by confiscation, amounts to total loss and abandonment. (Goss vs. Withers, 2 Burr., 683; 4 Cranch, 29; 4 Dallas, 421; 3 Wheaton, 183; 1 Wash. C. C., 145; 3 Mass., 238.)

In the case of the Vermont, in which the opinion already cited was delivered by Chancellor Kent, the vessel had been captured, the capture declared illegal by the French tribunal; pending an appeal by the captors, the cargo was delivered to the consignee upon bond given by them larger in amount than the insurance. The appeal was heard and the vessel with her cargo condemned, whereupon the insured sued upon the policy after expressly refusing to abandon. The court holding abandonment to be unnecessary, shows that any claim against the captors could only be prosecuted by the national Government, which, if compensation were obtained, would become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the reimbursement, and that this party is the insurance company, "if they should pay the amount of the bond;" that is, the insurer would be entitled to what he paid. This is in accordance with the general doctrine of insurance law laid down by Lord Cockburn in the following language:

I take it to be clearly established in the case of a total loss that whatever remains of the vessel in the shape of salvage, or whatever rights accrue to the owner of the thing insured and lost, they pass to the underwriter the moment he is called upon to satisfy the exigency of the policy, and he does satisfy it.

(North of England I. S. Ins. Co. vs. Armstrong, L. R. 5 Q. B., 244; see also Propeller Monticello vs. Mollison, 17 How., 152; Mercantile Marine Ins. Co. vs. Clark, et al., 118 Mass., 288; Shaw vs. United States, 8 C. Cls., 488; Dozier vs. United States, 9 C. Cls., 342.)

As long ago as 1 Vesey, sr., Lord Hardwicke, in case of an illegal seizure, held that the person originally sustaining the loss was the owner, but after satisfaction made to him, the insurer, so that if compensation be made for the seizure the assured stands as trustee for the insurer in proportion to what he has paid. (Randal vs. Cochran, 1 Ves. Sen., 97.) In another English case recovery was had in the court of commissioners of Alabama claims for the loss of a vessel by a Confederate cruiser, whereupon the insurer sued the claimant, the owner, and recovered. (Burnand vs. Rodocanachi, L. R. 5, C. P. Div., 424.)

In one New York case(United Ins. Co. vs. Scott, 1 Johns., 106) the court held that right of ownership in a captured vessel passed to the underwriters upon abandonment and payment of total loss; in another similar case (Robinson vs. United Ins. Co. 1 Johns., 592) the insurers were sustained in their endeavor to bring trover against the owners for a cargo captured, abandoned, and paid for, while the case of Gracie held abandonment useless, and in the Chinese indemnity claims this court ruled (Hubbel vs. United States, 15 C. Cls., 546) that underwriters who had paid losses sustained by reason of the capture and plunder of a vessel and cargo by Chinese pirates could participate in an indemnity fund paid therefor.

In some cases after payment of the insurance the assured executed an instrument, called a cession, in the nature of an assignment, by which they transferred to the insurer all rights to the property, and to any recovery on account of it; but the insurer's right is not based upon that instrument, as the Supreme Court held in Comegys vs. Vasse (1 Peters, 193) where the absence of an assignment was set up against the underwriter. The court said that—

"The law gives to the act of abandonment, when accepted, all the effects which the most accurately drawn assignment would accomplish."

So Justice Washington held in Hurtin vs. The Phœnix Insurance Company (1 Wash. C. C., 400):

"If a cession, as it is called, had been necessary to make the abandonment complete there might be something in the argument; but this is not the case. The abandonment amounts to a legal transfer of the rights of the insured, so as to enable the underwriters to pursue, to manage, and to recover the property, as effectually as if a regular deed had been made to them. * * * When it comes to be made a question whether the abandonment is invalid, if the cession is refused, we must say it is not; because such an instrument is not necessary to pass the right of the insured to the underwriters."

The authorities are entirely united on this point, and there can be no doubt of the validity of claims made by insurers who have paid loss by illegal capture, condemnation, and confiscation of vessels included in the descriptions of the act of January 20, 1885.

Remembering that the loss in cases where the vessel has been captured, condemned, and confiscated is a total loss, a "constructive" total loss, as it is sometimes called, and that abandonment is, therefore, unnecessary, we have a clear rule for our guidance in determining the amount of compensation coming to the underwriters. Kent said they were entitled to reimbursement; the Supreme Court that they were entitled to be reimbursed the amount paid; Lord Hardwicke that they should recover in proportion to what they paid; the Supreme Court, again, "the insurers are entitled only to damages to be recovered from an injury for which they have paid, and to such proportion only of those damages as the amount insured bears to the valuation in the policies (The Potomac, 105 U. S., 635), the underlying principle in the whole matter being the contract of insurance, which is one of indemnity (ibid.), therefore the insurer stands in the place of the insured to this extent, that he can recover indemnity or satisfaction; that is, what he paid under his contract. He has the right to be made whole, but nothing further.

There is no substantial contention as to the fact that the premium received, being part of the interest insured and paid, constitutes part of the insurer's loss, which he is entitled to recover. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss this point further. (1 Parsons, Marine Ins., p. 243; 2 ibid., p. 344; 2 Phillips on Insurance, sec. 1221.)

It has also been suggested that the underwriters should sue here in the name of the insured. If this point be well taken it would in effect defeat their claims, as the parties are dead, the next of kin and devisees are scattered, and to require each one to be found, or to require administration to be raised upon the estate of each of the original parties for use merely in fulfillment of some strictly technical requirement of the common law, which has no substantial value in the administration of this act, and does not tend to the protection either of claimants or of the Government, would be to defeat the very purpose of the legislature. Congress requires us to examine those valid claims of citizens of the United States which they had prior to a certain date; that is, claims then valid against France.

Underwriters who had fulfilled their contracts had such claims which would then undoubtedly have been recognized by the President, by Congress, and by France, without the intervention of the insured as mere figure-heads. We are also to find the present ownership; that is, the ownership in fact; the party entitled to receive the money should payment be made, the beneficiary of what Kent called the trust in the Government. Congress also, in case of assignment, requires the name of the assignee, the date of the assignment, and the consideration therefor. To hold that a distinction is to be made between what are termed equitable rights, as in this case, and technical common-law rights, might require us possibly to force the assignee to sue under the old rule in the name of his assignor, a construction manifestly not permitted by the language of the remedial statute.

We do not understand that we are to act as a court of common law under this act, which gives us simply advisory powers. So far as possible we shall follow the principles and doctrines of that law as affording a safe and proper guide, but it will be, doubtless, necessary under these very peculiar circumstances to depart from those principles and doctrines where an enforcement of their requirements, especially those technical in their nature, would result in substantial denial of justice. In the Chinese indemnity cases, under an act much stricter in its provisions than this is, we held the jurisdiction to be of an extraordinary nature, not limited and restrained by the ordinary rules applicable in most cases, and we entertained the claims of underwriters presented in their own names, as we shall do in these cases; therefore we do not examine the argument based upon the origin and nature of an insurer's rights.

Other points have been advanced in the argument in relation to the rights and equities of insurers, the effect of precedents established by international commissions, the value of the insurable interest, and similar questions, which it does not seem to us need be ruled upon in this preliminary discussion; what we have indicated herein as our opinion upon the general questions at issue will, we believe, afford a sufficient guide to parties for the present in the preparation of cases for trial.

The Government moves to strike out certain evidence as inadmissable, a motion which would be immediately granted were the case within the ordinary jurisdiction of the court; but the statute makes a material change in the law of evidence when it directs us to receive all suitable testimony, on oath or affirmation, and all other proper evidence, historic and documentary, concerning the claims. The construction of the words "suitable," as applied to testimony, and "proper," as qualifying evidence, may become of very serious importance hereafter. In this case, however, claimants urge that they have sufficient evidence without that objected to, and upon settlement of the facts we shall have, perhaps, occasion to verify that position, meantime it is impossible in advance to indicate any general rule as to the "proper" historic and documentary evidence, or as to the "suitable" testimony which may be received and considered.

Each claim and each document will probably present a different question. As to an ancient document, for example, the absence of suspicious circumstances surrounding it, the evidence of genuineness contained in it, its history, and its appearance, may all become important, and can only be settled by an examination of the paper itself with its antecedents and the circumstances peculiar to it. Nor is a general rule of evidence necessary to be announced in advance for the protection of either party's rights, as it is to be assumed that each side will in any event in cases of this nature produce all the evidence attainable.

The motion to strike out is denied without prejudice to defendants' right to renew it at the trial on the merits. The demurrer is overruled.

APPENDIX.

FRENCH SPOLIATION ACT OF 1885.

CHAPTER 25.—An act to provide for the ascertainment of claims of American citizens for spoliations committed by the French prior to the 31st day of July, 1801.

Be it enacted, etc. [SECTION 1]. That such citizens of the United States, or their legal representatives, as had valid claims to indemnity upon the French Government arising out of illegal captures, detentions, seizures, condemnations, and confiscations prior to the ratification of the convention between the United States and the French Republic concluded on the 30th day of September, 1800, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 31st day of July following, may apply by petition to the Court of Claims, within two years from the passage of this act, as hereinafter provided:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to such claims as were embraced in the convention between the United States and the French Republic concluded on the 30th day of April, 1803.

Nor to such claims growing out of the acts of France as were allowed and paid, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Spain concluded on the 22d day of February, 1819:

Nor to such claims as were allowed, in whole or in part, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and France concluded on the 4th day of July, 1831.

SEC. 2. That the court is hereby authorized to make all needful rules and regulations, not contravening the laws of the land or the provisions of this act, for executing the provisions hereof.

SEC. 3. That the court shall examine and determine the validity and amount of all the claims included within the description above mentioned, together with their present ownership, and, if by assignee, the date of the assignment, with the consideration paid therefor:

Provided, That in the course of their proceedings they shall receive all suitable testimony on oath or affirmation, and all other proper evidence, historic and documentary, concerning the same; and they shall decide upon the validity of said claims according to the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same, and shall report all such conclusions of fact and law as in their judgment may affect the liability of the United States therefor.

SEC. 4. That the court shall cause notice of all petitions presented under this act to be served on the Attorney General of the United States, who shall be authorized, by himself or his assistant, to examine witnesses, to cause testimony to be taken, to have access to all testimony taken under this act, and to be heard by the court. He shall resist all claims presented under this act by all proper legal defenses.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to procure, as soon as possible after the passage of this act, through the American minister at Paris or otherwise, all such evidence and documents relating to the claims above mentioned as can be obtained from abroad, which, together with the like evidence and documents on file in the Department of State, or which may be filed in the Department, may be used before the court by the claimants interested therein or by the United States; but the same shall not be removed from the files of the court;

And after the hearings are closed the record of the proceedings of the court and the documents produced before them shall be deposited in the Department of State.

SEC. 6. That on the first Monday of December in each year the court shall report to Congress for final action the facts found by it, and its conclusions in all cases which it has disposed of and not previously reported.

Such finding and report of the court shall be taken to be merely advisory as to the law and facts found, and shall not conclude either the claimant or Congress;

And all claims not finally presented to said court within the period of two years limited by this act shall be forever barred;

And nothing in this act shall be construed as committing the United States to the payment of any such claims.

January 20, 1885.

COURT OF CLAIMS. No. 3694 AND OTHERS.

William Q. Hooper, administrator, vs. The United States, and other cases.

Davis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This court has now delivered three opinions upon general issues raised in the French spoliations cases. The first related to the broad questions as to the validity against France of the claims as a class, and the resulting liability of the United States to the claimants; the second was directed more especially to forms of pleading, the value of evidence, and rights of insurers; while the third disposed of a motion made by the defendants for a rehearing of the general questions discussed in the first opinion. (Gray, administrator, vs. The United States, 21 C. Cls. R., p. 340; Holbrook, administrator, vs. The United States, 21 C. Cls. R., p. 334; Cushing, administrator, vs. The United States, 22 C. Cls. R., supra.)

A large number of cases have since been argued and submitted to the court, and certain general questions are found raised in many of them. Those questions we shall now proceed to discuss, as well as two points which were sent back by the court for further argument.

DURATION OF THE TREATIES OF 1778.

It is urged by the claimants that the treaties of 1778 remained in force, notwithstanding the abrogating act of July 7, 1798, until the final ratification of the treaty of 1800, and that these treaties prescribed the rule by which all the spoliation claims are to be measured. This position is denied by the Government.

For the purpose of this branch of the case the period of the spoliations may be divided into two parts, that prior to July 7, 1798, and that subsequent thereto and prior to the ratification of the treaty of 1800.

As to the first period, we find the position on both sides to have been consistent, which a few citations covering different years will clearly show.

In February, 1793, the national convention granted substantial favors to the United States, among them opening the ports of the colonies to American ships, and granting to produce carried in American bottoms duties the same as those imposed upon French vessels (Senate, Nineteenth Congress, First session, Document No. 102, p. 35). This was followed by the decree of March 26, 1793, granting new favors to what the convention called their "ally nation" (ibid., p. 36). Soon after this M. Le Brun, the minister of foreign affairs, replying to a complaint from our minister, Mr. Morris, said that he had requested the minister of marine "to prevent in the future the vessels of our good allies from being exposed to the attacks of our ships of war and privateers" (ibid., p. 38). Upon the 9th May, 1793 (ibid., p. 42), the convention passed a decree authorizing the arrest of neutral vessels laden wholly or in part with neutral property and bound to an enemy port, or laden with enemy merchandise.

Mr. Morris immediately demanded that the United States be exempted from the operation of this decree as contrary to the terms of the treaty of commerce (ibid., p. 44). His request was complied with, the convention's action in this regard being based upon the sixteenth article of that treaty (ibid., p. 46). Now occurred a curious incident in legislative history. Five days after the passage of the exemption the convention reversed its action. Mr. Morris protested (ibid., p. 47), and the 1st July the convention again decreed "that the vessels of the United States are not comprised in the dispositions of the decree of the 9th May, conformably to the sixteenth article of the treaty concluded the 6th of February, 1778." July 27th this exception was annulled and the United States were again thrown under the effect of the original decree of the preceding May (ibid., p. 50). Morris wrote Jefferson, then Secretary of State: "The decree respecting neutral bottoms, so far as it respects the vessels of the United States, has, you will see, been bandied about in a shameful manner. I am told, from Havre, that it is by the force of money that the determinations which violate our rights have been obtained; and, in comparing dates, events, and circumstances this idea seems to be but too well supported" (ibid., p. 52). Prior to this Mr. Morris had written the minister of foreign affairs asking that the matter be fixed definitely, otherwise "we must expect to see that species of dispute multiplied, in which cupidity on the one hand and fear on the other will give place to calumnious insinuations, which lead uninformed persons to think that the interests of individuals might influence the national decisions" (ibid., p. 47). This note was followed by the exemption of July, soon after which Morris laid before the foreign office more specific charges (ibid., p. 51), notwithstanding which the exemption was again reversed. In all this transaction the existing force of the treaties of 1778 was nowhere denied, and in the two exceptions was expressly admitted.

At this time Genêt was carrying on his objectionable course in the United States under the shelter, as he contended, of the treaties, whose binding effect Mr. Jefferson did not deny, while he disputed Genêt's construction of them (ibid., p. 53 et seq.).

Mr. Morris still endeavored to secure exemption from the May decree, but without success, and finally he wrote, during October, 1793, that in effect the minister of foreign affairs had acknowledged and lamented to him the impropriety of the decree, "but unable to prevail over the greater influence for the repeal of it, he is driven to the necessity of exercising a step which it is not possible to justify. There is no use in arguing with those who are already convinced, and where no good is to be expected some evil may follow. I have, therefore, only stated the question on its true ground, and leave to you in America to insist on a rigid performance of the treaty or slide back to the equal state of unfettered neutrality" (ibid., p. 75).

Mr. Monroe now succeeded Mr. Morris in Paris, and writing home that he "felt extremely embarrassed how to touch again upon their [the French] infringement of the treaty of commerce, whether to call on them to execute it or leave that question on the ground I had first placed it. * * * Upon full consideration I concluded that it was the most safe and sound policy to leave this point where it was before" (ibid, p 85). He evidently made a distinction between "advising and pressing" the execution of the treaty and insisting upon its execution. Instead of demanding its execution as a right he advised it as a politic act on the part of France, fearing that a more decided course on his part would lead to a counter demand for the execution by the United States of the guaranty clause. To this communication Monroe received from the Secretary of State a rather tart response, of which this is the important paragraph (ibid., p. 87).

"The fourth head of inquiry stated in your letter shows that you were possessed of cases which turned entirely upon the impropriety of the decree, and such, too, was certainly the fact. Now, without the abrogation of the decree, so far as it represented those cases, the redress which you were instructed to demand could not be obtained. In truth there was no cause or pretense for asking relief but upon the ground of that decree having violated the treaty. Does not this view lead to the inevitable conclusion that the decree, if operative in future instances, would be no less disagreeable, and consequently that its operation in future instances ought to be prevented, a circumstance which could be accomplished only by a total repeal?"

Soon after this the convention resolved to carry into strict execution the treaty of commerce of 1778 (ibid., p. 88), so that the year 1795 opened with a similar understanding on each side as to the enduring force of the treaty.

At this time commenced to circulate in France reports as to what Mr. Jay had been doing in England. Mr. Monroe thought the utmost cordiality had been restored between the two Republics, and yet feared that the prospect had become clouded by the rumors from England. In August, 1795, newspapers reached Paris which contained the text of the Jay treaty (ibid., p. 127), and so much feeling was aroused that, after considerable delay, it was decided to send an envoy to the United States to declare to our Government the dissatisfaction of the French in "respect to our treaty with Great Britain and other acts which they deemed unfriendly to them" (ibid., p. 129); a course which Monroe endeavored to prevent.

Thereupon followed, in March, 1796 (ibid., p. 131), a "summary exposition of the complaints of the French Government against the Government of the United States," in which an infraction of the treaties is relied upon as a legitimate grievance, and in answering which Monroe (ibid., p. 135) tacitly admits by his argument the enduring force of those treaties.

The Jay treaty was ratified, news thereof reached Paris (ibid., p. 142), and the threatening cloud burst.

The minister of foreign affairs informed Mr. Monroe that the directory regarded the Jay treaty as a breach of friendship, and saw "in the stipulations which respect the neutrality of the flag an abandonment of the tacit engagement which subsisted between the two nations on this point since the treaty of commerce of 1778. * * *

"After this, citizen minister, the executive directory thinks itself founded in regarding the stipulations of the treaty of 1778 which concern the neutrality of the flag as altered and suspended in their most essential parts by this act, and that it would fail in its duty if it did not modify a state of things which would never have been consented to upon the condition of the most strict reciprocity" (ibid., p. 143). Monroe argued in reply that the treaty of 1778 had not been violated, closing with a renewal of his complaints of French conduct in regard to American commerce.

Pinckney was now ordered out to succeed Monroe, but before he reached Paris France gave notice of intended reprisals (ibid., p. 147), and in October (1796) Monroe received a copy of the Executive Directory's decree of July 2, 1796, with notice that it would be applied to the United States, and that his functions as minister were suspended (ibid., p. 148). The decree provided that France should treat all "neutral vessels, either as to confiscations, as to searches or captures, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them." In communicating the decision of his Government, however, the French minister was careful to state that "the ordinary relations subsisting between the two people, in virtue of the conventions and treaties, shall not on this account be suspended." Pinckney arrived, but was not received, and Monroe was dismissed with language which Mr. Adams described as "studiously marked with indignities towards the Government of the United States."

This brings us to the close of 1796, and however strained the relations of the two countries had become, neither had yet endeavored to throw off the yoke of the treaties; on the contrary, all discussion was founded upon them as still in force.

In February, 1797, the French minister of foreign affairs claimed the benefit of the treaty in a fallacious argument as to the rôle d'équipage, suggesting incidentally that "the Federal Government doubtless had never ceased to look upon the treaty of 1778 as obligatory upon the two nations" (ibid., p. 156).

The decree of the Executive Directory of March 2, 1797, which is very harsh upon neutrals, speaks of the treaties as existing in a shape modified by the Jay treaty (ibid., p. 160). In April succeeding, the condemnation of an American vessel is excused as in accordance with treaty; and this is again done in the following November. The instructions to Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry (July 15, 1797) recognized the treaties as still in force (ibid., p. 453); and the 18th March, 1798, Talleyrand based his complaints upon them (ibid., p. 493). Finally Congress found it necessary by statute to declare the treaties abrogated; an action clearly useless if they were non-existent; an action which in effect admitted their continuing force to that day.

The treaties of 1778, particularly the treaty of commerce, which is the important one for our purposes, were in existence until the passage of the abrogating act. Whatever disputes occurred between this country and France during the disturbed period following the conclusion of the Jay treaty arose from differences of interpretation of various clauses of the Franco-American treaty, and on neither side do we find seriously advanced a contention that the treaties were not in existence and were not binding upon both nations. The United States distinctly urged their enduring force, while the French departed from this position only in this (if it be a departure), that the Jay treaty introduced a modification into their treaty with us, of which they were entitled to the benefit.

We are of opinion that the treaties of 1778, so far as they modified the law of nations, constituted the rule by which all differences between the two nations were to be measured after February 6, 1778, and before July 7, 1798.

As to the period after July 7, 1798: On that date the abrogating act passed by the Congress was approved by the President and became a law within the jurisdiction of the Constitution; a law replacing to that extent the treaties, and binding upon all subordinate agents of the nation, including its courts, but not necessarily final as the annulment of an existing contract between two sovereign powers.

A treaty which on its face is of indefinite duration and which contains no clause providing for its termination may be annulled by one of the parties under certain circumstances. As between the nations it is in its nature a contract, and if the consideration fail, for example, or if its important provisions be broken by one party, the other may, at its option, declare it terminated. The United States have so held in regard to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as to which Mr. Frelinghuysen, then Secretary of State, wrote Mr. Hall, minister in Central America (July 19, 1884):

"The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was voidable at the option of the United States. This, I think, has been demonstrated fully on two grounds. First, that the consideration of the treaty having failed, its object never having been accomplished, the United States did not receive that for which they covenanted; and, second, that Great Britain has persistently violated her agreement not to colonize the Central American coast."

Here concur two clear reasons for annulment, failure of consideration and an active breach of contract.

Abrogation of a treaty may occur by change of circumstances, as—

"When a state of things which was the basis of the treaty, and one of its tacit conditions, no longer exists. In most of the old treaties were inserted the clausula rebus sic stantibus, by which the treaty might be construed as abrogated when material circumstances on which it rested changed. To work this effect it is not necessary that the facts alleged to have changed should be material conditions. It is enough if they were strong inducements to the party asking abrogation.

"The maxim 'Conventio omnis intelligitur rebus sic stantibus' is held to apply to all cases in which the reason for a treaty has failed, or there has been such a change of circumstances as to make its performance impracticable except at an unreasonable sacrifice." (Wharton's Com. Am. Law., § 161.)

"Treaties, like other contracts, are violated when one party neglects or refuses to do that which moved the other party to engage in the transaction. * * * When a treaty is violated by one party in one or more of its articles, the other can regard it as broken and demand redress, or can still require its observance." (Woolsey, § 112.)

The United States annulled, or at least attempted to annul, the treaties with France upon the grounds, stated in the preamble of the statute, that the treaties had been repeatedly violated by France, that the claims of the United States for reparation of the injuries committed against them had been refused, that attempts to negotiate had been repelled with indignity, and that there was still being pursued against this country a system of "predatory violence infracting the said treaties and hostile to the rights of a free and independent nation." Such were the charges upon which was based the enactment that "the United States are of right freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaty and of the consular convention heretofore concluded between the United States and France, and that the same shall not henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States."

The treaties therefore ceased to be a part of the supreme law of the land, and when Chief-Justice Marshall stated, in July, 1799 (Chirac vs. Chirac, 2 Wheaton, 272), that there was no treaty in existence between the two nations, he meant only that within the jurisdiction of the Constitution the treaties had ceased to exist, and did not mean to decide, what it was exclusively within the power of the political branch of the Government to decide, that, as a contract between two nations, the treaties had ceased to exist by the act of one party, a result which the French ministers afterward said could be reached only by a successful war.

The only question we have now to consider is that of the international relation. The annulling act issued from competent authority and was the official act of the Government of the United States. So far as it was within the power of one party to abrogate these treaties it was indisputably done by the act of July 7, 1798. Notwithstanding this statute did not the treaties remain in effect to this extent, if no further, that they furnish a scale by which the acts of France, which we are charged to examine, are to be weighed; and in considering the legality of those acts, are we not to follow the treaties where they vary the law of nations? The claimants in very learned and philosophical arguments contend for the affirmative.

In the first place we are referred by them to the course of the Executive; this, it is said, is binding upon the judiciary, and is favorable to their contention. This position we will first examine.

In 1829 the Supreme Court had occasion to construe the treaties relating to the purchase of Louisiana, particularly that of San Ildefonso. The Executive had already given an interpretation to that instrument, and Marshall, C. J., who delivered the opinion of the court, said on this point (Foster et al. vs. Nelsion, 2 Peters, 253):

"In a controversy between two nations concerning national boundary, it is scarcely possible that the courts of either should refuse to abide by the measures adopted by its own Government. There being no common tribunal to decide between them, each determines for itself on its own rights, and if they can not adjust their differences peaceably, the right remains with the strongest. The judiciary is not that department of the Government to which the assertion of its interests against foreign powers is confided; and its duty commonly is to decide upon individual rights, according to those principles which the political departments of the nation have established. If the course of the nation has been a plain one, its courts would hesitate to pronounce it erroneous. We think then, however, individual judges might construe the treaty of San Ildefonso, it is the province of the court to conform its decisions to the will of the legislature if that will has been clearly expressed" (p. 307).

In United States vs. Arredondo (6 Peters, 711) and in Garcia vs. Lee (12 Peters 511) this principle was acknowledged and affirmed, while later in Williams vs. Suffolk Insurance Company (13 Peters, 415) the court said as to the recognition of Buenos Ayres (p. 420):

"And can there be any doubt that when the executive branch of the Government, which is charged with our foreign relations, shall in its correspondence with a foreign nation assume a fact in regard to the sovereignty of any island or country, it is conclusive on the judicial department? And in this view it is not material to inquire, nor is it the province of the court to determine, whether the Executive be right or wrong. It is enough to know that in the exercise of his constitutional functions he has decided the question. Having done this under the responsibilities which belong to him it is obligatory on the people and Government of the Union. * * * In the cases of Foster and Nelson (2 Peters, 253, 307) and Garcia vs. Lee (12 Peters, 511) this court have laid down the rule that the action of the political branches of the Government in a matter that belongs to them is conclusive."

We find in Phillips vs. Phillips an even stronger affirmance of this position when the court say that in cases like it "the judicial is bound to follow the action of the political department of the Government and is concluded by it" (92 U. S. R., 130).

The action of the Executive is, then, conclusive upon the judiciary when that action is taken within the jurisdiction given by the Constitution. That instrument marks out with marvelous clearness and foresight the duties assigned to each of the three branches of Government therein created; within its own domain each of these branches is supreme, the executive no less than the legislative, the legislative no less than the judiciary, and the judiciary no less than either of the other two.

How does this rule apply to the cases now before us? The Legislature, with the President who approved the bill, have annulled the treaties to the extent of whatever power they may have had in the premises, which is all the power possessed by the United States over the subject-matter. Do subsequent acts of the Executive alone under these circumstances, acts done in an effort to procure compensation for injured citizens, statements made and positions assumed in a negotiation, many of them perhaps taken argumentatively, others perhaps advanced in an effort to reach a middle ground upon which both parties could stand and which would result in substantial advantage to the nation and its individual citizens; do such acts, statements, or positions necessarily bind us here?

The statute which gives us all the jurisdiction we have over these claims requires us to examine, not those claims which the United States advanced, but those claims of specified classes which were "valid" "upon the French Government." It can not be seriously contended that because the Executive pressed a claim that the claim was therefore "valid" as between the nations. The act clears any doubt on this point, if there could be any, by prescribing the test we are to apply in ascertaining the validity of a claim; that test is, "the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties of the United States applicable to the same."

The distinction we have heretofore made must be emphasized between the position and jurisdiction of this court under this very exceptional statute, and their position and jurisdiction, or those of any other court of the United States, when acting under general laws, whether statutory or unwritten.

Because the President urged a claim upon France it did not necessarily become as between France and the United States a "valid" claim. The rule as to the effect of executive decision applies as well in France as in the United States; France resisting the claim may contend with equal force that her position is correct, and yet one of the parties to the dispute must be wrong. This reductio ad absurdum seems hardly necessary, and yet it serves to illustrate the distinction we seek to make clear as to this court's peculiar jurisdiction.

Suppose the decision of the Executive, even in the case assumed, be binding upon the judiciary administering the law within the United States, and the authorities do not go to this extent, still it does not follow that such a decision upon any of these claims is binding upon us now. We are instructed to discover, not what the Executive believed or contended for or argued, but what claims were in fact and in law "valid" as against France, and valid by the rules of law, municipal and international, and the treaties.

The contention has, however, other aspects, which must have serious examination; and it therefore becomes necessary to see what was the contention of this Government as to the treaty rules after the passage of the annulling statute. For this purpose we must again turn to the correspondence.

It is well to bear in mind that the question of the guaranty had well-nigh been eliminated from discussion. France had never formally asked its enforcement; on the contrary, had preferred that we should remain at least nominally neutral, that she might reap the benefit of our food supply. Monroe had feared that too strong a position on our part might bring about a demand for the aid pledged; but Pickering had no apprehension, and clearly regarded the obligation as without practical danger. Fear of the guaranty hampered our officers, but the real, practical difficulty on the French side was the Jay treaty; on ours, the spoliations.

Monroe was dismissed; Pinckney was not received; the Pinckney, Marshall, Gerry mission was not officially recognized, and they had returned home, when, in October, 1799, Mr. Pickering, Secretary of State, addressed to Messrs. Ellsworth, Davies, and Vans Murray, the newly-appointed ministers to France, their instructions, in which under thirty different heads, concluding with seven ultimata, he set forth the position of the United States. He told them that the conduct of France would well have justified an immediate declaration of war, but desirous of maintaining peace and being willing to leave open the door of reconciliation, the "United States contented themselves with preparations for defense, and measures calculated to protect their commerce" (Doc. 102, p. 561). The claims for "spoliation" are to be advanced immediately as an indispensable condition of a treaty, and all captures and condemnations are to be deemed "irregular or illegal when contrary to the law of nations generally received and acknowledged in Europe, and to the stipulations in the treaty of amity and commerce of the 6th of February, 1778, fairly and ingenuously interpreted, while that treaty remained in force, especially when made and pronounced."

In this instruction, then, Mr. Pickering draws the line very distinctly between the standard of demand as to claims arising prior to the annulling statute and those founded upon acts committed subsequent thereto. Further on he says (ibid., p. 570):

"The seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the commercial treaty between the United States and France of February 6, 1778, have been the source of much altercation between the two nations during the present war. The dissolution of that and our other treaties with France leaves us at liberty with respect to future arrangements; with the exception of the now preferable right secured to Great Britain by the twenty-fifth article of the treaty of amity and commerce. In that article we promise mutually that while we continue in amity, neither party will in future make any treaty that shall be inconsistent with that article or the one preceding it. We can not, therefore, renew with France the seventeenth and twenty-second articles of the treaty of 1778. Her aggressions, which occasioned the dissolution of that treaty, have deprived her of the priority of rights and advantages therein stipulated."

He speaks of the "dissolution" of the treaties as of an existing fact, says the United States can make no treaty, that is, no new treaty inconsistent with the Jay treaty, that therefore they can not "renew"—note the word—certain articles of the French treaty; in short, the whole instruction is founded upon an admission at least, if not an assertion, that the treaties no longer were in force.

The newly-appointed ministers, acting under these instructions, opened negotiations by proposing to arrange, first, claims of citizens of either nation, whether founded on contract, treaty, or the law of nations, and then to stipulate for reciprocity and freedom of commercial intercourse (ibid., p. 580). The French, however, thought the first object of negotiations should be "the determination of the regulations and the steps to be followed for the estimation and indemnification of injuries for which either nation may make claim for itself, or for any of its citizens. And the second object is to assure the execution of treaties of friendship and commerce made between the two nations" (ibid., p. 581). We have already so fully considered the details of this long negotiation (21 C. Cls. R., pp. 340 et seq.) that they need not now be repeated. A careful rereading of all the correspondence which we have been able to obtain on this subject but confirms our previous conclusion that:

"Starting under their instructions, events had forced the ministers to offer unlimited recognition of the treaties of 1778, coupled with a pecuniary equivalent to extinguish in the future their most onerous provisions; even this was not accepted, and the French, returning to their original ground, said that no indemnity could be granted unless the treaties were recognized without qualification as to the future, and this they said with the avowed object of avoiding the payment of indemnity."

The American ministers recognized that the French contention had substantial value, so much so that they offered 8,000,000 francs to settle it; but they did not recognize that it was correct in fact or law, or that the annulling act was without effect. On the contrary they argued:

"A treaty being a mutual compact, a palpable violation of it by one party did, by the law of nature and of nations, leave it optional with the other to renounce and declare the same to be no longer obligatory. * * * For a wrong decision it would doubtless be responsible to the injured party, and might give cause for war; but even in such case, its act of public renunciation being an act within its competence would not be a void but a valid act, and other nations whose rights might thereby be beneficially affected would so regard it." (Doc. 102, p. 612.)

Finally, the second article of the treaty of 1800, as signed in Paris, expressly stated that the ministers plenipotentiary of the two parties were not able to agree respecting either the treaties or indemnities. These points then remained as they were at the opening of the negotiation.

We fail to find that the Executive did, after the passage of the annulling statute, recognize the existing force of the treaties as an international obligation, whatever value may have been accorded to the claim of France that one party was without power to abrogate them.

The course of the Executive in the long contentions with France is not binding upon us now under the jurisdiction given by the statute of January, 1885. That statute grants a very peculiar power, imposes upon us a very original duty—that of examining in the light of law, municipal and international, and in the light of the treaties, the validity of the claims of this Government against that of France. Such a grant of jurisdictional power necessarily negatives any binding presumption founded upon Executive action. The President, individually and through the Secretary of State, expressly and repeatedly demanded satisfaction of the spoliation claims; this was of course known to the Legislature which directed us to investigate these very claims.

The Congress does not do a vain act, and to require us to examine the validity of claims under a rule of law which presupposes them to be valid because the Executive urged them in diplomatic negotiation would be vain. The intention of the statute is that we shall not be concluded by the President's position in these negotiations, but shall, under the standard set for us, inquire afresh as to claims' "validity" against France. Even if this were not so, still there is nothing in the action of the Executive, after the act of 1798, tending to show an intention to recognize the continuing existence of the treaties. On the contrary, the whole argument proceeded upon the opposite hypothesis.

Claimants contend that not the act of 1798, but the agreement to expunge the second article of the treaty of 1800 terminated the treaties of 1778. The rescission of that article undoubtedly terminated the dispute as to the existence of these treaties and removed that dispute from the forum of international discussion. We are not prepared to admit that it recognized as valid the contention of France as to the treaties, although it recognized that the contention had substantial value. A claim may be admitted to have value for purposes of negotiation or compromise without an admission of its validity in fact or law. This is true in private affairs, and is especially true in diplomacy where questions of national pride, tradition, custom, and pique have to be considered most carefully and often are of most serious importance.

Counsel urge that France insisting the treaties remained in force should be bound by them, and they make the apt illustration that if the two nations had agreed at the time upon mutual indemnities France would have been held to the treaty rules. This assumption is probably correct. France having obtained the benefit she desired would in justice be bound by the corresponding obligation. "Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus." But that is not this case, for France entirely failed to secure a recognition of the continuing force of the treaty.

The treaty of 1800 contained a provision that "property captured and not yet definitely condemned" should be restored upon production alone of the passport of 1778. These captures must, in almost all instances if not in all, have taken place subsequent to the annulling statute, and it is urged with much force that if the treaties were non-existent France was entitled to demand the proofs required by the general law of nations; as she expressly yielded this point and, as to these cases, agreed to abide by the treaty rule, therefore it can not be doubted (urge counsel) that had these claims now before us been taken into the treaty of 1800 they would have been subjected to the same standard.

Perhaps they would have been. France, obtaining treaty recognition, would have been bound by treaty rules; but this did not occur, and as France failed to obtain treaty recognition is she therefore to be bound by treaty rules because in one instance she made a special exception in specific terms? We think not. A treaty changes the law of nations only in so far as it contains provisions to that effect. The parties may covenant that as between themselves the law of nations shall not apply in particular instances; except in those instances that law remains in force.

The treaties had served their purpose; the conditions which they contemplated had changed. Whatever may have been the justice of French complaints of our course with Great Britain, and whatever may have been her rights under the circumstances, still she had so invaded the rights of the United States to free commerce in innocent cargoes upon the high seas that a case was presented of such failure of consideration and of such active infraction of the treaties that this country was in a position to proclaim them ended.

Free ships, free goods, had become a dead letter. The passport which the treaty prescribed as a sufficient protection was disregarded, and various other aggressions upon the shipping of the United States were committed, aggressions admittedly forbidden by the treaty provisions.

We are of opinion that the circumstances justified the United States in annulling the treaties of 1778; that the act was a valid one, not only as a municipal statute but as between the nations; and that thereafter the compacts were ended. We fail to find any agreement by France as to these claims to submit to the treaty rules after July 7, 1798, the treaties not being recognized by us, and we conclude that the validity of claims not expressly mentioned in the treaty of 1800, which arose after July 7, 1798, is to be ascertained by the principles of the law of nations recognized at that time, and not by exceptional provisions found in the treaties of 1778.

INSURANCE TO COVER.

Insurance to cover is that amount of insurance which in case of accident will entirely reimburse the insured for his loss. It includes not only the value of the property, but also the cost of the insurance procured to protect it.

Phillips in his work on insurance thus states the question argued here (§ 1221):

"The premium on the premium is to be included in computing the amount to be insured in order to cover the interest and replace the exact value of the subject in case of total loss."

Some of the claimants ask that they be allowed unpaid premiums of insurance as an element of the value of property lost, and if so that such premium be allowed upon the theory of insurance to cover.

The able arguments and briefs of counsel for claimants on these questions have been listened to and examined with great care. Whatever difficulty we might find were the matter here presented for the first time is removed by the precedents established by the Supreme Court. In the Anna Maria (2 Wharton, 325) the court allowed "The value of the vessel and the prime cost of the cargo with all charges, and the premium of insurance, where it has been paid, with interest." In Malley vs. Shattuck (2 Cranch, 458) the court said (citing The Charming Betsey):

"In pursuance of that rule the rejection of the premium for insurance, that premium not having been paid, is approved; but the rejection of the claim for outfits of the vessel and the necessary advance to the crew is disapproved. Although the general terms used in the case of The Charming Betsey would seem to exclude this item from the account, yet the particular question was not under the consideration of the court, and it is conceived to stand on the same principle with the premium of the insurance, if actually paid, which was expressly allowed."

Following the Supreme Court we shall allow premiums of insurance when actually paid, and not otherwise.

ARMED VESSELS.

In cases heretofore submitted a question arose as to the effect upon claimants' rights of the following facts, or either of them, should they or either of them be found to exist:

A. That the vessel acted as a privateer.

B. That the vessel possessed the license or authority described in either the act of June 25, 1798, or in the act of July 9, 1798, authorizing the class of seizure described in those acts or in the act of May 28, 1798.

These questions were ordered to be and have been reargued.

The provisions of the three laws above recited are very different in effect, that of the latest date being the one most important in the consideration of these cases. The act of May 28 (1 Stat. L., 561), "to more effectually protect the commerce and coasts of the United States" empowered the President to give certain orders to the armed vessels of the nation and contained no illusion to vessels owned by individuals. The act of June 25 (ibid., p. 572) authorized "the defense of the merchant vessels of the United States against French depredations," and to that end allowed the commanders and crews of such vessels to "oppose and defend against any search, restraint, or seizure" attempted by a French vessel, to "repel by force any assault or hostility" on the part of such French vessel, to "subdue and capture the same" and to retake any American vessel captured by the French.

The act of July 9 (ibid., p. 578), gave to private armed vessels specially commissioned the same license and authority "for the subduing, seizing, and capturing any armed French vessel, and for the recapture of the vessels, goods, and effects of the people of the United States, as the public armed vessels of the United States may by law have" (§ 2). This statute, therefore, authorized private armed vessels to take any armed French vessel "found within the jurisdictional limits of the United States or elsewhere on the high seas" (§ 1), and to recapture American vessels taken by the French. (See acts May 28 and June 25, 1798.)

Many of the vessels whose cases are before us carried armament of some kind, and several are shown to have had a special license, commission, or authority, issued probably by virtue of the power given the President in the last two acts of Congress.

The marked distinction between the act of June and that of July is in this: The former permitted defense only except in the matter of recapture, while the latter authorized attack, but attack only on armed vessels. Nowhere in the statutes is there any permission given to molest French merchantmen, although France was then engaged in the acts of illegal seizure and condemnation from which the spoliation claims arose. Defendants urge that the arming of a merchantman and the presence on board of a special license under the acts cited destroyed any right of recovery as against France and consequently as against the United States.

We have held (Gray's case, 21 C. Cls. R., 375) as to the relations between the two countries during the period in question that "no such war existed as operated to abrogate treaties, to suspend private rights, or to authorize indiscriminate seizures and condemnations; that, in short, there was no public general war, but limited war, in its nature similar to a prolonged series of reprisals." There was not what Wheaton calls "a perfect war," but a war "limited as to places, persons, and things;" the Congress authorized hostilities, but only on the high seas or within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, and then only by certain specified vessels on certain specified vessels.

As far as Congress authorized and tolerated it so far might we proceed in hostile operations, and the word "enemy" goes the full length of this qualified war and no further (21 C. Cls. R., 371). The hostilities were confined on the one side of the United States to attack on French armed ships and to recapture of our own. The capture of enemy mercantile shipping is an important mark of a state of war, one of its principal incidents, and it is significant of the relations between the two Governments that not a movement was made by Congress or the Executive in this direction.

A privateer is an armed vessel belonging to one or more private individuals, licensed by Government to take prizes from an enemy; its authority in this regard must depend altogether upon the extent of the commission issued to it, and is qualified and limited by the laws under which the commission is issued. (The Thomas Gibbons, 8 Cranch, 421.)

Letters of marque and reprisal may theoretically issue in time of peace (articles of confederation signed 1778, article 9), as they form a "mode of redress for some specific injury which is considered to be compatible with a state of peace and permitted by the law of nations" (Kent, vol. I, p. 61). The commission authorizes "the seizure of the property of the subjects as well as of the sovereign of the offending nation, and to bring it in to be detained as a pledge or disposed of under judicial sanction, in like manner as if it were a process of distress under national authority for some debt or duty withheld" (ibid.). Speaking very technically, a letter of marque is merely a permission to pass the frontier, while a letter of reprisal authorizes a "taking in return," a taking by way of retaliation, a captio rei unius in alterius satisfactionem. The colloquial use together of the two names, letter of marque and letter of reprisals, leads sometimes to misunderstanding as to the differing effect of each, one being a simple authority to depart, the other an authority to seize property in compensation for an injury committed.

The licenses or commissions of 1798 contained no hint of intended reprisals, for no authority to seize a French merchantman is contained in them, although the French had long been capturing our commercial marine. There was, however, express authority to seize armed vessels and to recapture American vessels; that is, in its essence, authority to defend, not to attack.

Within the limits prescribed by the Congress there was war; limited, imperfect war, not general public war, but war complete as to the vessels engaged in it to the extent only of the powers given by the Congress. Following in the path marked out by the Supreme Court in the prize cases which came before them during this period, and of which Bass vs. Tingey is a fair example, we are led to the conclusion that where a private vessel was fitted for the purpose of attacking armed French vessels, and of recapturing American vessels seized, she fell within the rules of war, and if captured, became legitimate prize. The relations of the two nations being strained to hostilities within certain distinctly defined bounds, within those bounds the active agents of either Government were subject to the rules of war, and vessels intending to seize must submit to seizure.

It does not, however, follow that every vessel having a special license under the acts of 1798, or every vessel having some armament on board, falls within this rule. Long within the memory of men now living many portions of the ocean since freely opened to commerce were infested by pirates who boarded peaceful merchantmen, plundered the vessels, and murdered the crews, or dragged them to the horrors of slavery. The literature relating to the early part of the century is filled with anecdotes based upon the outrages of such freebooters, and the heroic deeds of those sent out by the different Governments to capture or destroy them. Vessels tempting these waters found it advisable to carry some armament, so that failing efficient convoy, or in case of other accident, they might be prepared to cope on comparatively equal terms with these robbers of the sea.

At the particular period we now are considering, to the danger from pirates in some parts of the world was added the danger from French privateers who acted in so illegal and unjustifiable manner as to call from Lord Stowell this opinion:

"It has certainly been the practice of this court, lately, to grant salvage on recapture of neutral property out of the hands of the French, and I see no reason at the present moment to depart from it. I know perfectly well that it is not the modern practice of the law of nations to grant salvage on recapture of neutral vessels, and upon this plain principle, that the liberation of a clear neutral from the hand of the enemy is no essential service rendered to him, inasmuch as that same enemy would be compelled by the tribunals of his own country, after he had carried the neutral into port, to release him, with costs and damages for the injurious seizure and detention. This proceeds upon the supposition that those tribunals would duly respect the obligations of the law of nations; a presumption which, in the wars of civilized nations, each belligerent is bound to entertain in their respective dealings with neutrals.

"But it being notorious to all Europe, in the present war, that there has been a constant struggle maintained between the governing powers of France, for the time being, and its maritime tribunals, which should most outrage the rights of neutral property—the one by its decrees, or the other by its decisions—the liberation of neutral property out of their possession has been deemed, not only in the judgment of our courts, but in that of neutrals themselves, a most substantial benefit conferred upon them, in a delivery from danger against which no clearness and innocence of conduct could afford any protection. And a salvage for such service has not only been decreed, but thankfully paid, ever since these wild hostilities have been declared and practiced by France, against all acknowledged principles of the law of nations and of natural justice. When these lawless and irregular practices are shown to have ceased, the rule of paying salvage for the liberation of neutral property must cease likewise.

* * * * * * *

"No proof is offered that the maritime tribunals of France have, in any degree, corrected either the spirit or the form of their proceedings respecting neutral property generally; and, therefore, I shall not think myself authorized to depart from the practice that has been pursued, of awarding a salvage to the captors." (The Onskan, 2 Robinson, pp. 300, 301.)

And later he said:

"It is certainly true that the standing doctrine of the court has been that neutral property, taken out of the possession of the enemy, is not liable to salvage. It is the doctrine to which the court has invariably adhered till it was forced out of its course by the notorious irregularities of the French cruisers and of the French Government, which proceeded, without any pretense of sanction from the law of nations, to condemn neutral property.

"On these grounds it was deemed not unreasonable by neutrals themselves that salvage should be paid for a deliverance from French capture. The rule obtained early in the war, and has continued to the present time. It is said that a great alteration has taken place in the French proceedings, and that we are now to acknowledge a sort of return of 'Saturnia regna.' This court is not informed, in a satisfactory manner, that any such beneficial change has taken place in the administration of prize law in the tribunals of France; and, therefore, it will continue to make the same decree till the instructions of the superior court shall establish a different rule." (Eleonora Catharina, 4 Rob., 157. See also Talbot vs. Seeman, 1 Cranch, 1.)

In the Gulf of Mexico the danger of seizure by small vessels, technically French privateers, but actually so irresponsible to governing power as to be in form only superior to freebooters, made the possession of some armament by an innocent trader a matter of wise precaution, if not of necessity, especially as in some instances the danger from the French tribunals was nearly as great as from the privateers. We are told, for example, that vessels were condemned by such tribunals because the ship's compass had an English brand, because the cooking utensils were of English manufacture, or because the vessel was destined to an English port. The Secretary of State thus characterized the situation:

"American property had even been taken when in their own ports, without any pretense, or no other than that they wanted it. At the same time their cruisers are guilty of wanton and barbarous excesses, by detaining, plundering, firing at, burning, and distressing American vessels."

The acts of the French privateers were so illegal as to be stigmatized as "piracies" both by Mr. Pickering and in the two Legislative Councils of France (Doc. 102, p. 410)

As early as June, 1793, Morris complains "of the plundering of our ships, of which complaints are daily made to me and which the present Government of the country is too feeble to prevent" (ibid., p. 48), and he writes to the French minister "that it will be very difficult, and perhaps impossible, to prevent your privateers from committing illegal and outrageous acts as long as they are permitted to bring into your ports all the American vessels laden with articles of food for countries at war with France (ibid., p. 49). Later he informs the Secretary of State that "in the present state of the country the laws are but little respected; and it would seem as if pompous declarations of the rights of man were reiterated only to render the daily violation of them more shocking" (ibid., p. 52).

In October he says "the courts chicane very much here," and he speaks of their proceedings as "iniquitous" (ibid., p. 367). In December, 1796 (ibid., p. 151), Major Mountflorence, in his general report as to American commercial interests in France, says that on the 27th of the preceding April power had been given to the tribunals of commerce in every port of France to take cognizance in the first instance of every matter relative to captures at sea, with an appeal to the civil tribunals of the different departments, and with a reference in certain instances to the minister of justice.

He adds:

"The tribunals of commerce are chiefly composed of merchants, and most of them are directly or indirectly more or less interested in the fitting out of privateers, and, therefore, are often parties concerned in the controversies they are to determine upon."

In illustration he cites the condemnation of the Royal Captain, saying that most of the "judges were concerned in the capturing privateer."

In January, 1797, Mr. Pickering wrote to Mr. Pinckney as follows:

"The commissioners and special agents of the French Republic in the West Indies are destroying our commerce in the most wanton manner. They have issued orders for taking all American vessels bound to or from English ports—not those only which the English occupy in St. Domingo, but those of their own islands. They condemn without the formality of a trial. These orders appear from the information I have received to have been issued in consequence of letters from Mr. Adet, who, you will see in his note of November 15, said the French armed vessels were not merely to capture American vessels, but to practice vexations toward them; and who, I am further informed, wrote to the commissioners that they could not treat the American vessels too badly. This state of things can not continue long. It makes little difference whether our vessels go voluntarily to French ports or are carried in as prizes. In the latter case they condemn without ceremony, and in the former they forcibly take the cargoes, heretofore with promises of payment, which they generally broke; and now, I am told, without even deigning to give their faithless promises" (Ibid., p. 154).

In the following February he writes again to Pinckney, saying (Ibid., p. 154):

"The spoliations on our commerce by French privateers are daily increasing in a manner to set every just principle at defiance. If their acts were simply the violation of our treaty with France the injuries would be comparatively trifling, but their outrages extend to the capture of our vessels merely because going to or from a British port. Nay, more, they take them when going from a neutral to a French port. In truth, there is, in a multitude of cases, little difference whether our vessels are carried in as prizes or go voluntarily to the French ports in the islands for the purposes of traffic; the public agents take the cargoes by force and fix their own terms, giving promises of distant payment, which are seldom duly performed.

"With regard to the vessels carried in as prizes, the agents and tribunals of the French Government act in concert with the privateers. The captured are not admitted to defend their property before the tribunals; the proceedings are wholly ex parte. We can account for such conduct only on the principle of plunder, and were not the privateers acting under the protection of commissions from the French Government, they would be pronounced pirates. Britain has furnished no precedents of such abominable rapine."

In April, he writes again (ibid., p. 164) that "the depredations of the French in the West Indies are continued with increased outrage, and we have advices of captures and condemnations in Europe which apply to no principle heretofore known and acknowledged in the civilized world." (See also ibid., pp. 166, 171, 173, 174, 177.)

Citations of this kind might be multiplied, but it seems useless to do so, as the situation is familiar history. Certainly, under these circumstances, some attempt at defense was natural and excusable, if not justifiable.

Judges "are not to shut their eyes to what is generally passing in the world" (Blatchford Prize Cases, page 443), nor as to what has already taken place. In danger from native pirates, in danger from French privateers often as irresponsible (Cushing's Ad. vs. United States, 22 C. Cls. R., supra), the mere possession of some armament by a merchantman is devoid of marked significance. It is improbable that any important venture was sent to sea without an effort on the part of the ship-owner to protect his property and that laden on his vessel; cannon enough or muskets enough he would put on board to give his crew a fair chance of escape from a small force. The statute, however, said that no armed merchantman should receive a clearance or permit, or be suffered to depart unless the owners and the master gave bond conditioned, among other things, that the vessel should not commit any depredation, outrage, unlawful assault, or unprovoked violence upon the high seas against the vessel of any nation in amity with the United States (1 Stat. L., page 573).

Under this act no vessel having any armament could proceed to sea without bond first given, and this bond, being coupled in the acts with the issuance of special orders or license, what more natural than for the innocent merchantman, desiring only safe transit of a commercial venture, to receive in return the commission which the act provided should be given him. The act of July 9 (ibid, p. 578) contains a similar provision, and the result of both statutes is that no private vessel carrying armament could proceed to sea without bond filed in return for which a commission might be issued.

In our view of the case it is vital to note the distinction between armament for protection simply and armament for attack upon armed vessels or for attack upon captured American vessels necessarily in charge of prize crews. A privateer is maintained for profit; the venture is most speculative in its nature, bringing large returns for great risk. Given the right to prey upon the mercantile marine, great armament is not necessary, as combat may be avoided by speed and quickness in maneuver. The privateering authorized by the acts of 1798 was of no such nature; not a prize could be taken without conflict, for only armed vessels or vessels in charge of prize crews could be seized; not a merchantman was allowed to be molested.

A vessel, then, fitting out under the acts of 1798 for the purpose of waging the limited hostility therein permitted, must have been prepared for battle; must have been ready to wage war. She could not mount a few guns and carry a few dozen muskets, with a small crew, when the success of her voyage depended upon the number of well-defended vessels she should send into port for condemnation. A vessel intended to act aggressively under the laws of 1798 would have to fight for every dollar brought into the pockets of the owners, master, and crew, and, knowing this, would proceed to sea with an equipment sufficient for the very serious work contemplated.

One of the vessels holding a commission under the acts of 1798 was a schooner of about 111 tons, old measurement. She had a crew of seven men, carried what was called a letter of marque, two guns, and a cargo of merchandise; she was duly cleared on a trading voyage, with instructions to the master as to the sale of the cargo and the purchase of a return venture. Such a vessel as this could not have been seriously intended to seize French armed vessels or captured American vessels defended by French prize crews. Seven men, all told, were barely enough to navigate the schooner; aside from the master, there were but three to a watch, and on an emergency it is extremely doubtful whether the total force was sufficient to handle the two guns and the vessel at the same time. Possibly some defense might have been made against a boat-load of pirates putting off from the shore while the schooner lay becalmed near it, but it is not within the bounds of possibility that such a vessel, with so slight a crew and so insignificant an armament, should contemplate attack upon a well-defended vessel.

We are told that 365 vessels, of 66,691 tonnage, carrying 6,847 men and 2,723 guns, received commissions under the acts of 1798, prior to March 2, 1799. The average tonnage per vessel was then 185 tons, the average crew 16, and the average armament 7 guns. On the other hand, one Government armed vessel (taken for illustration) of 190 tons burthen carried 18 guns and 140 men, while another of 200 tons carried the same armament and crew. So far as has yet appeared to us no private armed merchantman made a single capture from the French, and we are assured that no such capture was made. So far as concerns the cases now before us, it would be practically impossible for such a capture to be made, for most of the vessels were small, and they were manned only for ordinary navigation and not for war, with an armament insufficient to cope with organized military force. Neither seven nor even sixteen men is a crew for a vessel intended to attack French armed ships or to recapture those manned by prize crews, and no merchantman with so small a crew and laden with valuable cargo would undergo such risk.

That Congress did not contemplate the employment in attack of small or undermanned vessels is shown by the proviso in the act of July 9, 1798, that the bond should be doubled in case "the vessel be provided with more than one hundred and fifty men," from which an inference may not unfairly be drawn that not far from one hundred and fifty was considered a fair equipment for a vessel designed to fight. We have seen that the Government war vessel about equivalent in tonnage to the average licensed merchantman carried about one hundred and forty men, and coupling this fact with the act of Congress we reach the result already indicated by common sense, that Congress had in mind, so far as privateers were concerned, fighting ships—those able to attack a French privateer with reasonable hope of success, and not vessels with insignificant crew and armament, bound on a trading voyage, and provided with those slight means of defense which were at the time ordinarily carried by merchantmen for protection.

That armament, when carried by strictly commercial vessels bound upon trading voyages, was intended for defense is shown by the report of the House committee, made January 17, 1799 (American State Papers, Naval Affairs, vol. 1, p. 69). They said:

"Your committee begs leave to report further, that about the time of the sailing of our ships of war, and before the merchant ships were permitted to arm for their defense, our trade was in such jeopardy at sea and on the coast from French privateers, that but few vessels escaped them; that ruin stared in the face all concerned in shipping, and that it was difficult to get property insured."

Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, officially expressed the opinion of his Government as to armed merchantment in his circular of August 4, 1793, as follows:

"The term privateer is understood not to extend to vessels armed for merchandise and war, commonly called with us letters of marque, nor, of course, to vessels of war in the immediate service of the government of either of the powers at war."

Twelve days later Jefferson, in an instruction to Morris as to the English ship Jane, which Genet has requested might be ordered to sail, a request authorized, Genet contended, by the twenty-second article of the treaty of commerce, said (Doc. 102, p. 58):

"The ship Jane is an English merchant vessel, employed in the commerce between Jamaica and these States. She brought here a cargo of produce from that island, and was to take away a cargo of flour. Knowing of the war when she left Jamaica, and that our coast was lined with small French privateers, she armed for her defense, and took one of those commissions usually called letters of marque. She arrived here safely without having had any rencontre of any sort. Can it be necessary to say that a merchant vessel is not a privateer? That though she has arms to defend herself in time of war, in the course of her regular commerce, this no more makes her a privateer than a husbandman following his plow in time of war with a knife or pistol in his pocket is thereby made a soldier."

"The occupation of a privateer is to attack and plunder; that of a merchant vessel is commerce and self-preservation. The article excludes the former from our ports and from selling what she has taken; that is, what she has acquired by war, to show that it did not mean the merchant vessel and what she had acquired by commerce. Were the merchant vessels coming for our produce forbidden to have any arms for their defense, every adventurer who has a boat or money enough to buy one would make her a privateer; our coasts would swarm with them, foreign vessels must cease to come, our commerce must be suppressed, our produce remain on our hands, or at least that great portion of it which we have not vessels to carry away; our plows must be laid aside, and agriculture suspended. This is a sacrifice no treaty could ever contemplate, and which we are not disposed to make out of mere complaisance to a false definition of the term privateers."

This matter has also been specifically passed upon by the French courts. The ship Fame, Rust, master, was in June, 1799, tried by the tribunal of commerce sitting at Bayonne. Several grounds were relied upon by the captors as authorizing condemnation, all of which were overruled by the tribunal. Among them was the following:

"Is the letter of marque, of which the vessel was the bearer, sufficient to cause it to be considered as an enemy?"

This question was thus answered:

"Considering the point relative to the letter of marque of which the ship was the bearer. That the French Government without doubt is not ignorant of the delivery of like letters by the Government of the United States to the vessels of the said United States nor of the terms in which these letters are conceived. That now and up to the present time it has not been manifested that it regarded this circumstance and the act of Congress of the United States of the month of July, 1798, either as a declaration of war, or as hostilities against France, since it has not asked of the legislative body a law declaring the French nation to be in a state of war with the United States of North America. That a state of war can not be established or declared without a law of the legislative body. That it does not belong to the tribunals to take notice of any step that a foreign power may take as constituting a state of war between France and itself.

"That the condemnation demanded of the said ship Fame and of her cargo because of the said letter of marque can not be founded upon any law, and can not and ought not to be pronounced. The said ship besides, not having opposed any resistance, suffered itself to be visited at the summons which was made to it by the said privateer. There is, then, no occasion to accede to the demand of the captors upon this point." (See Record in case Nathaniel Richardson, executor of Joshua Richardson et al. vs. The United States, No. 5343.)

This case was appealed to the civil tribunal of the department, and thence to the council of prizes, which latter tribunal, on the 13th December, 1800, released the vessel and cargo in accordance with the judgment of the two lower tribunals.

The Pégou carried ten cannon. She was provided with muskets and munitions of war.

The law officer of the French Government having charge of the case made the following points among others (see Pistoye et Duverdy, Prises Maritimes, vol. 2, p. 51):

"It is not enough to have or carry arms to deserve the reproach of being armed for war (p. 52).

"War armament is for purely offensive use. This is shown when there is no object in the armament but attack, or at least when everything tends to prove that such is the principal object of the enterprise * * * But defense is a natural right, and means of defense are legitimate in sea-voyages as in all other occurrences perilous to life. A vessel having but a small crew, whose cargo was considerable, was evidently intended for commerce, not for war. The arms found in this vessel were not intended for violence or hostility, but to prevent them; not to attack, but to defend. The point as to war armament, then, seems to me unfounded."

The Pégou was discharged with damages to her captain.

In the case of the Friend, of Boston, a letter of marque had been found on board; the vessel was armed for defense; there was no resistance; summons from the privateer was obeyed, and the master's instructions directed him to avoid acts of offense and to be prudent. The commissaire of the Government urged that these were not reasons for capture. The vessel was condemned on other grounds. (Pistoye et Duverdy, vol. 1, p. 501.)

Further, Article IV of the treaty of 1800, which relates to "armed" and "unarmed" merchantmen, shows that France did not stand upon the point urged here by the defense, but admitted the right of armament to the extent at least of the cases now before us, as its courts did in the cases cited above.

It is worthy of remark that two classes of license or commission were allowed by the acts of Congress. The first act authorized instructions from the President as to defense only, except that the recapture of American vessels was permitted. The second act allowed capture of armed Frenchmen. In the absence of proof as to which document a vessel possessed there can be no presumption that it was issued under the latter rather than under the former statute; in fact, the presumption, which always favors what is natural, might lean towards the possession of instructions under the first act when it appears that the crew was small, the armament light, and the object of the voyage commercial in its nature.

The distinction must not be forgotten between a legal and justifiable seizure and an illegal and unjustifiable condemnation. The seizure of a vessel may be successfully defended upon grounds which would not support a subsequent condemnation, and "prize courts deny damages when there was probable cause for the seizure, and are often justified in awarding to the captors their costs and expenses," even when the vessel and cargo are decided not good prize and are returned to their owners. (The Thompson, 3 Wall., 155; Jecker vs. Montgomery, 13 How., 498; Murray vs. The Charming Betsey, 2 Cr., 64.)

We conclude that a vessel fitted for the purpose of seizing French armed vessels and of recapturing American vessels was, when taken, legitimate prize as an actor in the limited war defined by Congress; but that the mere arming of a merchantman whose object was trade, subordinate to which was the provision for protection, did not authorize seizure and condemnation even if an instruction or license under either of the acts of 1798 were found on board. In these cases, as in every case arising between nations, technicalities must be thrown aside, and the very essence and spirit of the transaction must be discovered by the light of the facts peculiar to each case.

BLOCKADE IN WEST INDIES.

It is urged by the defendants that the British possessions in the West Indies were in a state of blockade, and occupied in such a manner as properly to be regarded in a state of siege. That, therefore, the condemnations of vessels bound for those ports with cargoes otherwise innocent were legal and justifiable. The argument has turned more particularly upon vessels bound for Martinique so that for purpose of illustration we will consider the case of that island, formerly a French possession and captured by England during the war.

The defendant's argument assumes that Martinique was blockaded; that it was practically in a state of siege; that its predominant character was that of a port of military naval equipment; and therefore the seizure of neutral vessels bound to that port was justified, although the cargo was otherwise innocent.

The law of blockade is so clear that while a few citations may be given for the sake of illustration they seem to us hardly necessary.

Kent says:

"The law of blockade is, however, so harsh and severe in its operation that in order to apply it the fact of the actual blockade must be established by clear and unequivocal evidence; and the neutral must have had due previous notice of its existence; and the squadron allotted for the purpose of its execution must be competent to cut off all communication with the interdicted place or port; and the neutral must have been guilty of some act of violation, either by going in or attempting to enter, or by coming out with a cargo laden after the commencement of the blockade. The failure of either of the points requisite to establish the existence of a legal blockade amounts to an entire defeasance of the measure, even though the notification of the blockade has issued from the authority of the Government itself.

"A blockade must be existing in point of fact, and in order to constitute that existence, there must be a power present to enforce it. All decrees and orders declaring extensive coasts and whole countries in a state of blockade, without the presence of an adequate naval force to support it, are manifestly illegal and void, and have no sanction in public law. The ancient authorities all referred to a strict and actual siege and blockade. The language of Grotius is oppidum obsessum vel portus clausus, and the investing power must be able to apply its force to every point of the blockaded place, so as to render it dangerous to attempt to enter, and there is no blockade of that part where its power can not be brought to bear." (Vol. 1, pp. 144-5.)

The United States have contended that a blockade must be effective to be valid (note b. to Kent, vol. 1, p. 145) and admitted the principle even as to its own ports during the late war. This question has been very ably discussed in a late note from the Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard, to the minister representing the United States of Colombia, in which, after citing authorities, the Secretary reaches the following conclusions:

"After careful examination of the authorities and precedents bearing upon this important question, I am bound to conclude as a general principle that a decree by a sovereign power closing to neutral commerce ports held by its enemies, whether foreign or domestic, can have no international validity and no extraterritorial effect in the direction of imposing any obligation upon the governments of neutral powers to recognize it or to contribute towards its enforcement by any domestic action on their part.

"Such a decree may indeed be necessary as a municipal enactment of the state which proclaims it, in order to clothe the executive with authority to proceed to the institution of a formal and effective blockade, but when that purpose is attained its power is exhausted. If the sovereign decreeing such closure have a naval force sufficient to maintain a blockade, and if he duly proclaim such a blockade, then he may seize, and subject to the adjudication of a prize court, vessels which may attempt to run the blockade. If he lay an embargo, then vessels attempting to evade such embargo may be forcibly repelled by him if he be in possession of the port so closed. But his decree closing ports which are held adversely to him is, by itself, entitled to no international respect. Were it otherwise, the de facto and titular sovereigns of any determinate country or region might between them exclude all merchant ships whatever from their ports, and in this way not only ruin those engaged in trade with such states, but cause much discomfort to the nations of the world by the exclusion of necessary products found in no other market." (Note, dated April 24, 1885. See also Hall, International Law, §§ 257 and 260; 3 Phillimore, 311 and 516; case of The Sarah Star, Blatchford's Prize Cases, 69-87; Lawrence's Wheaton, pp. 575 et seq.)

Sir William Scott thus laid down the rule:

"To constitute a violation of blockade three things must be proved: First, the existence of an actual blockade; second, the knowledge of the party supposed to have offended; and, third, some act of violation, either by going in or coming out with a cargo laden after the commencement of blockade." (The Betsey, 1 Rob. Adm., p. 92. As to Berlin and Milan decrees see Woolsey, § 206.)

Therefore to justify seizure the blockade must be effective, notice must have been given and there must be an attempt to violate it.

Was Martinique effectively blockaded?

Defendants have referred us to no authority to show that it was, and we have made such examination as the sources of historical investigation on this subject afforded without finding any statement to that effect. The records of the numerous spoliation cases in this court which have been brought to our attention throw no light on the subject, as they proceed upon the fact that the condemned vessel was bound to an enemy port or laden with enemy produce and the condemnations rest upon French decrees.

An examination of the history of Anglo-French naval operations directly affecting the West Indies discloses the following events:

February 2, 1794, an English expedition sailed from the Barbadoes to attempt the capture of Martinique, then under the command of General Rochambeau. This expedition consisted of three ships of the line, eight frigates, four sloops, two store-ships, and one bomb, under command of Vice-Admiral Sir John Jervis, carrying something less than 6,100 troops, commanded by Lieut. Gen. Sir Charles Grey. The French garrison was insignificant in number, consisting only of some 600 men, including 400 militia, while at Fort Royal was a 28-gun frigate, and at St. Pierre an 18-gun corvette. Possibly a privateer or two was also available. The British arrived off the island the 5th of February, and some idea may be gained of the heroic defense of the French from the fact that with the overwhelming force at their command the British did not obtain a surrender until the 22d of March.

The forts were garrisoned, Lieutenant-General Prescott was given command, a small squadron, under Commodore Thompson, was left to co-operate with him in case of attack, and the rest of the expedition embarked the 31st March to attack St. Lucie (James's Naval History, volume 1, page 217 et seq.), which surrendered without the loss of a life upon the 4th of April. Then followed the conquest of Grande-Terre, another expedition having taken the three small islands adjacent to Guadeloupe, called the "Saintes," and on the 20th April all Guadeloupe and its dependencies surrendered, comprising the islands of Marie Galante, Desirade, and the Saintes, at an expense of two British rank and file killed, four rank and file wounded, and five missing. A French 16-gun corvette was captured in this expedition, but was not deemed fit for service.

Early in June a French squadron of two frigates, one corvette, two large ships, armed en flûte, and five transports anchored off the village of Gosier, Guadeloupe, and began disembarking troops commanded by Victor Hugues, bearing the title of commissaire civil. After skirmishes with the British garrison and French royalists, in which Hugues's troops were successful, a considerable force of vessels and men were sent by the British to dislodge them. The result was the withdrawal of the British from Grande-Terre the 3d July, just one month after Hugues's arrival. In October the French received re-enforcements, took Basse-Terre, and the 6th October, 1794, were again masters of Guadeloupe, except a small port called Fort Matilda, which, so tenacious was the resistance, they did not capture until December 10.

At the close of the preceding year the British had obtained possession of Cape Nicolas Mole, Jérémie, and other French villages in San Domingo, and in February, 1794, other places on the island fell into their hands after trifling resistance. In May a strong force was sent by the British against Port au Prince, which surrendered June 4. In December the British post at Cape Tiburion was attacked and captured by French troops, assisted by three armed vessels (ibid.). As soon as news of Hugue's victory reached France there were dispatched to his assistance a 50-gun frigate, a 36-gun frigate, two corvettes, an armed ship or two, and eight or ten transports, with three thousand troops and suitable stores.

"The arrival of this important re-enforcements inspired Victor Hugues with designs against the other ceded islands. Having not only troops but transports to convey and ships of war to protect them, this demon of republicanism, whose barbarity, as fully accredited on several occasions, was of the most revolting description, readily contrived to land soldiers at Sainte Lucie, St. Vincent, Grenada, and Dominique. Artful emissaries accompanied the troops, and soon succeeded in raising a ferment in the islands which they visited. The negroes, Caribs, and many of the old French inhabitants revolted, and dreadful were the atrocities perpetrated upon the well affected. * * * The British troops, thinly distributed from the first and since reduced by fatigue and sickness, could offer in general but a feeble resistance to the numbers of different enemies opposed to them. The garrison of Sainte Lucie, numbering 2,000 men, evacuated the island on the 19th of June" (1795). By the 27th of June the "rebellion" in Dominique had been quelled "by the few British troops stationed there, assisted by the bulk of the inhabitants," St. Vincent and a part of Grenada remaining in a revolted state. (Ibid. 298., et seq.)

In April and May, 1796, the English took, without conflict, the Dutch settlements of Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice. On the 24th May, after a stubborn combat of over a month, Sainte Lucie was captured by the British troops and vessels. June 11 St. Vincent surrendered, as a few days later did Grenada. So far as appears the French had no armed ships at either of these islands. In the preceding March the British made an unsuccessful attack upon the town and fort of Léogane, San Domingo, and a successful one upon the fort and parish of Bombarde. No French ships appear in these actions, but a squadron arrived at Cape François May 12, but returned immediately to France. (Ibid., 367, et seq.)

February, 1797, a British squadron left Port Royal, Martinique, for the purpose of attacking the Spanish colonies. Trinidad soon fell into their hands, and, touching at Martinique on the way, the squadron proceeded to Porto Rico, the attack upon which was unsuccessful. In April the French 36-gun frigate Harmonie was destroyed by the English near Jean Babel while sailing under orders to convoy to Cape François, from Port au Prince and Jean Babel, a number of provision-laden American vessels captured by French privateers. An action between three of the British fleet, a French privateer, and a French battery in Carcasse Bay, is the only other engagement noted as having taken place in the West Indies during this year. (Ibid., Vol. II, p. 97 et seq.)

The year 1798 opened with the evacuation by the British in April of Port au Prince, St. Marc, and Arcahaye, all in San Domingo, shortly after which three French 36-gun frigates landed supplies at Cape François and returned home. An engagement between the British and Spanish was the only other important naval event of this year in the Gulf. In August, 1799, the British took the Dutch island of Surinam, finding in the river a French corvette, the Hussar, which was added to the British navy. (Ibid., p. 373.) September 13, 1800, the island of Curaçoa surrendered to the British, and fourty-four vessels were found lying in the harbor, but no war ships. (Ibid., Vol. II, p. 59.)

In May, 1793, the Hyena, of 24 guns, and La Concorde, of 40 guns (the advance frigate of a French squadron of some six vessels), had an engagement off Cape Tiburion, which resulted in the defeat of the former. In July the English frigate Boston, after capturing the first lieutenant of the French frigate Embuscade, then lying in the harbor of New York, challenged the Frenchman to battle, a challenge which was accepted; the battle took place without decided result, and during it what was supposed to be a large French squadron appeared in the offing, while two French frigates were afterwards found by the Boston lying in the mouth of the Delaware, where she sought refuge. In November a combat took place between Penelope and Iphigenia on the one side and the Insurgente on the other, in the bight of Léogane, island of San Domingo, resulting in the defeat of the French frigate. (Ibia., Vol. I, p. 88 et seq.)

In December, 1794, the British frigate Blanche, cruising off the island of Désirade, a dependency of Guadeloupe, then in French possession, cut out a government armed schooner of 8 guns, which, to escape, had anchored in the bottom of the bay of Désirade. Later the Blanche had an encounter with the French 36-gun frigate Pique off Point-à-Pitre, in which, after a battle most gallant on both sides, the Pique was captured. In May there was a battle in Chesapeake Bay between two English frigates and five lightly-armed Frenchmen, most of them store-ships. (Ibid., 274 et seq.)

On the 4th of May, 1796, the Spencer engaged and captured the French gunbrig Vulcan in latitude 28° north, longitude 69° west.

In July, 1796, a combat without definite result took place between the frigates Aimable (English) and Pensée (French), beginning off "Englishman's Head," Guadeloupe, while in August the Mermaid attacked the Vengeance within gun fire from Guadeloupe batteries, and in July the Quebec was chased by two French frigates when not far from Port au Prince.

August 25, 1796, the British 20-gun ship Raison engaged the Vengeance, the Mermaid's former opponent, in latitude 41° 39′ north and longitude 66° 24′ west, without definite result. Later in the same month an English squadron captured the French frigate Elizabeth off Cape Henry. In September the Médée engaged the Pelican off Guadeloupe. The action had no definite result, and it appears that at this time the Thetis (French) and either the Pensée or the Concorde were at anchor in Guadeloupe. The Pelican was so much inferior to the Médée in armament that Hugues sent an aid-de-camp under a flag of truce to the Saintes to inspect her as she lay there at anchor.

On the 10th August, 1797, the 38-gun British frigate Arethusa captured, after stern resistance, the French corvette Galeté, sighting at about the same time the brig-corvette Espoir, of 14 guns, and a third vessel supposed to be a small French war vessel. Five days later the Alexandrian, schooner of 6 guns, acting as tender to the flag-ship at Martinique and engaged in quest of French privateers, captured a privateer schooner and chased another, which escaped. September 17, the Pelican destroyed the French privateer Trompeuse off Cape St. Nicholas Mole. The 4th October, the Alexandrian captured the French privateer Epicharis. January 3, 1798, the British armed sloop George, of 6 guns, while on a passage from Demerara to Martinique, was captured by two Spanish privateers. Thirteen days later boats from the 20-gun ship Babet, then cruising between Martinique and Dominique, captured the French armed schooner Desirée.

April 17 the British schooner Recovery, cruising in the West Indies, fell in with the privateer Revanche and compelled her to surrender. May 7 the British brig-sloop Victorieuse, while passing to leeward of Guadeloupe, was attacked without success by two French privateers. The same vessel during the following December, aided by the 14-gun brig-sloop Zephyr and some troops, after an attack upon the Spanish in the island of Margarita, took out the privateer Couleuvre, of 6 guns and 80 men, from the port of Gurupano. July 11 boats from the British 44-gun ship Reguius cut out three vessels at anchor in Aquada Bay, Porto Rico. December 11 the British 22-gun ship Perdrix captured the French privateer Armée d'Italie not far from St. Thomas.

March 30, 1799, boats from the British frigate Trent and cutter Sparrow cut out a Spanish merchant ship and schooner which they found in a bay of Porto Rico, at the same time storming and carrying a small Spanish battery. April 13, the Amaranthe, a British 14-gun brig-sloop, captured the French letter-of-marque schooner Vengeur after the latter had made a noble resistance.

The officers and crew of the Abergavenny, stationary flag-ship at Port Royal, tired of inaction during the whole of 1797 and part of 1798, fitted out on their own account, a frigate launch which was so successful in prize-taking that its proprietors were enabled to purchase with their prize-money a small schooner named the Ferret, which became the tender of the Abergavenny.

The Ferret early in October, 1799, had a very sharp encounter with a Spanish privateer without decisive result. Later in the same month the British brig-sloop Echo cruising off Porto Rico, chased a French letter-of-marque into Laguadille Bay and cut her out, and not long after occurred the daring capture of the Hermione in the harbor of Puerto Cabello. In November the Crescent and Calypso adroitly saved their convoy from a Spanish squadron. Still later in that month the Solebay cruising off San Domingo, encountered a French squadron recently arrived at Cape François from France and bound to Jacmel. Strange to say, this 32-gun frigate captured all the French vessels without casualty on either side.

The squadron consisted of 4 vessels mounting 58 guns, manned with 431 men, while the frigate carried 38 guns and about 212 men. In December an indecisive conflict took place off the island of Porto Santo between the Glenmore and Amiable in charge of an outward bound British West India convoy, and the Sirene and Bergere bound from Rochelle to Cayenne with 450 troops and Victor Hugues on board. (James, Vol. II, pp. 79 et seq.; 198 et seq.; 313 et seq.)

Early in April, 1800, boats from the sloop Calypso off Cape Tiberion, carried the French privateer Diligente. In August the 38-gun frigate Seine cruising in the Mona passage, sighted the Vengeance bound from Curaçoa to France, which, after a sharp combat, surrendered. In October the schooner Gypsie (British) cruising off Guadaloupe, captured the Quidproquo of 8 guns. (James, Vol. III, p. 27 et seq.)

(Consult also Life of Decatur, Sparks' series of Biography, 31; Cooper's Naval History United States, Vol. I.)

We have now set forth in this catalogue at somewhat tedious but necessary length every naval action (except some few unimportant combats with privateers) of which we can find record, which took place from 1793 to 1800, both years inclusive, between British and French or Spanish naval forces, on or near the eastern coast of America, between the latitude of Boston and the northern coast of South America. The reason for so voluminous a list, which, while probably not without omissions, we believe to be sufficiently correct, is that from it alone can any conclusion be drawn as to the amount of the French naval force and its uses during the period in dispute. For convenience to those whose interest or duty it may be to investigate this question we have cited but from one authority, and one which while not without fault of national prejudice, is carefully and conveniently compiled. Other authorities examined by the court re-enforce the conclusions we draw from the citations already made.

Martinique, it is alleged, was effectively blockaded. This is not affirmatively shown, and perhaps we might rest here; but in this class of cases we have thought it right to go further and to endeavor to throw all the light in our power upon the exact situation.

From the citations made and also from the history of the American Navy certain facts clearly appear as worthy of notice.

First, the very small number of encounters between vessels of the English navy and French vessels of war.

Second, that no such encounter took place near Martinique, the two captures of privateers by the Alexandrian being the only combats mentioned as occurring in the vicinity of that port after its occupation by the English.

Third, that not a word is said, or an allusion made, in any attainable authority as to a blockade, or an attempted blockade in fact, of any West Indian English port. It does not appear that any armed vessel, English or American, was ordered to, or attempted to, break any such blockade although the English force was at times very large in the West Indies and was actively engaged. Neither in Cooper's Naval History nor in the Life of Decatur, nor in any other work relating either to the English or American Navy which we have been able to consult, nor in the diplomatic correspondence of the period, do we find any statement tending to show that there existed anything other than a paper blockade, a blockade useless and void in so far as neutral rights were affected.

Further proof of this absence of effective blockade is found in the large number of merchant vessels which safely traded with these ports during the period in question, and in the lack of contention on the part of France, notwithstanding Mr. Pickering's vigorous language (Doc. 102, pp. 408, 410), that they were maintaining or endeavoring to maintain an effective blockade.

We have already seen that the French Government did not desire the fulfillment of the treaty's guaranty clause, deeming it wiser on their own account that we should not embark in the war. Genet and the colonists complained of our course on this subject, but the home Government did not agree with them. As late as March, 1798, Talleyrand wrote to Pinekney and his colleagues that "the Republic was hardly constituted when a minister was sent to Philadelphia, whose first act was to declare to the United States that they would not be pressed to execute the defensive clauses of the treaty of alliance, although the circumstance, in the least equivocal manner, exhibited the casus fœderis" (4 Wait's Am. State Papers, p. 97).

We find no claim by France that the treaty was abrogated by a failure by the United States to fulfill the guaranty clause. During and soon after 1794 the West India Islands fell into the hands of Great Britain, yet in 1795 (January 3) a French decree reciting the law of December, 1794, ordering the treaties of 1778 to be respected as in force, declared, in favor of the United States, the principle of free ships, free goods, except as to ports actually blockaded. As against this position of his superiors, Hugués, in February, 1797, issued his order subjecting to capture and confiscation vessels and cargoes destined to the captured islands, giving as a reason the failure of the guaranty.

The fact, then, that some of the West India Islands had been taken from France does not seem to complicate the legal question.

It is urged that provisions bound for Martinique were properly condemned, on the ground, substantially, that as the port was in possession of an enemy force, it must be assumed they were intended to feed that force, and therefore were contraband by destination. (Citing The Peterhoof, 5 Wal., p. 58; 2 Black., 671 and 672, "The Prize Cases;" Desty on Shipping, § 423; Letens Droits. Recip., p. 114; Blatchford's Prize Cases, p. 464.)

As far back as Grotius the distinction was made between things useful only for war, the carriage of which by neutrals is prohibited, things which serve merely for pleasure, the carriage of which is permitted, and things useful both in peace and war, as money or provisions, which are sometimes lawful articles of neutral commerce, and sometimes not, according to the circumstances existing at the time. Thus provisions would be contraband if bound to a besieged camp or port. Kent, who seems to be the most liberal of the writers towards defendants' position, thus lays down the rule:

"The modern established rule is, that provisions are not generally contraband, but may become so under circumstances arising out of the particular situation of the war, or the condition of the parties engaged in it. Among the circumstances which tend to preserve provisions from being liable to be treated as contraband, one is that they are the growth of the country which produces them. Another circumstance to which some indulgence is shown by the practice of nations is when the articles are in their native and manufactured state. Thus iron is treated with indulgence, though anchors and other instruments fabricated out of it are directly contraband. Hemp is more favorably considered than cordage; and wheat is not considered as so objectionable a commodity, when going to an enemy's country, as any of the final preparations of t for human use. The most important distinction is, whether the articles were intended for the ordinary use of life or even for mercantile ships' use, or whether they were going with a highly probable distination to military use.

"The nature and quality of the port to which the articles are going is not an irrational test. If the port be a general commercial one, it is presumed the articles are going for civil use, though occasionally a ship of war may be constructed in that port. But if the great predominant character of that port, like Brest in France, or Portsmouth in England, be that of a port of military naval equipment it will be presumed that the articles were going for military use, although it is possible that the articles might have been applied to civil consumption. As it is impossible to ascertain positively the final use of an article ancipitis usus, it is not an injurious rule which deduces the final use from the immediate destination, and the presumption of a hostile use, founded on its destination to a military port, is very much inflamed, if, at the time when the articles were going, a considerable armament was notoriously preparing, to which a supply of those articles would be eminently useful." (Vol. I, p. 139.)

The Supreme Court has decided that provisions the growth of the enemy's country, but the property of a neutral, and carried in a neutral vessel, are good prize because destined to supply the enemy's forces; and the court added that provisions are not generally contraband, but may become so because of their destination or the particular situation of the war. If intended for the ordinary use of life, they are innocent; if intended for the enemy's forces or his ports of warlike equipment, then their seizure is justifiable. (The Comerccen, 1 Wheaton, 382.)

Bluntschli thinks it against "gute sitte" to treat trade in provisions as contraband even if it serves the hostile army's use (Mod. Völkerrecht, § 807). Heffter (Europäisches Völkerrecht, § 160) holds that belligerents may take measures against the export by neutrals of doubtful articles, articles occasionally contraband, only when a destination for the enemy's government and military forces can be shown on adequate grounds. Ortolan denies that provisions and objects of prime necessity may be considered contraband, except in cases not pertinent to this discussion (Vol. II, 179). Hautefeuille goes much further and admits as contraband only arms and munitions of war ready for immediate use, fit to be used as such and for no other purpose. (Droits des Nations Neutres, II, 419.)

Klüber leans the same way and holds that presumptions are in favor of freedom of trade (§ 288), and Martens states that the law in Europe prior to the first armed neutrality, 1780, considered as contraband only articles of direct use in war. Vattel sanctions the seizure of provisions "in certain junctures when we have hopes of reducing the enemy by famine" (Liv. III., ch. 7, sec. 112), but Wheaton believes he intended to carry the principle no further than to the case of a besieged city; and commenting on Grotius, Wheaton reaches the conclusion that the latter sanctions the seizure of provisions, not bound to a port besieged or blockaded, only when made for preservation or defense "under the pressure of that imperious and unequivocal necessity which breaks down the distinctions of property," and this power should not be exercised until all other possible means have been used, then not if the right owner is under a like necessity, and even then restitution shall be made as soon as possible. Bynkershoek and Rutherfurth concur in this view. (Wheaton, pp. 556 to 558.)

Wheaton expresses no definite opinion for himself, but clearly leans to the side of freedom towards the neutral.

In 1793 (May 7), Mr. Jefferson instructed Mr. Pinckney in relation to a fear expressed by the latter that the belligerent powers might stop our vessels going with grain to enemy ports, that "such a stoppage to an unblockaded port would be so unequivocal an infringement of the neutral rights that we can not conceive it will be attempted." This instruction was followed by another dated September 7, 1793, in which Mr. Jefferson, after stating that in time of war neutrals are free to pursue their ordinary avocations of agriculture, manufacture, and commerce, with the exception of not furnishing to either belligerent "implements merely of war for the annoyance of the other, nor anything whatever to a place blockaded by its enemy," proceeds to define these "implements" as follows:

"There does not exist, perhaps, a nation in our common hemisphere, which has not made a particular enumeration of them in some or all of their treaties under the name of contraband. It suffices for the present occasion to say that corn, flour, and meal are not of the class of contraband, and consequently remain articles of free commerce. A culture which, like that of the soil, gives employment to such a proportion of mankind, could never be suspended by the whole earth, or interrupted for them, whenever any two nations should think it proper to go to war. * * * If any nation whatever has a right to shut up to our produce all the ports of the earth except her own and those of her friends, she may shut up these also, and so confine us within our own limits. No nation can subscribe to such pretensions; no nation can agree, at the mere will or interest of another, to have its peaceable industry suspended and its citizens reduced to idleness and want. * * *

"It is not enough for a nation to say we and our frends will buy your produce. We have a right to answer that it suits us better to sell to their enemies as well as their friends. Our ships do not go to France to return empty. They go to exchange the surplus of one product which we can spare for surpluses of other kinds which they can spare and we want; which they can furnish on better terms and more to our mind than Great Britain or her friends. We have a right to judge for ourselves what market best suits us, and they have none to forbid us the enjoyment of the necessaries and comforts which we may obtain from any other independent country."

Mr. Randolph, denying that food can be universally ranked "among military engines," admitted that corn, meal, and flour are so in case of "blockade, siege, or investment." In the late Franco-Chinese war France endeavored to make "rice" contraband, and, referring to this contention, Mr. Kasson, our minister in Berlin, wrote as follows to the Secretary of State:

* * * "But more especially I beg your attention to the importance of the principle involved in this declaration, as it concerns our American interests. We are neutrals in European wars. Food constitutes an immense portion of our exports. Every European war produces an increased demand for these supplies from neutral countries. The French doctrine declares them contraband, not only when destined directly for military consumption, but when going in the ordinary course of trade as food for the civil population of the belligerent government.

"If food can be thus excluded and captured, still more can clothing, the instruments of industry, and all less vital supplies be cut off on the ground that they tend to support the efforts of the belligerent nation. Indeed, the real principle involved goes to this extent, that everything the want of which will increase the distress of the civil population of the belligerent country may be declared contraband of war. The entire trade of neutrals with belligerents may thus be destroyed, irrespective of an effective blockade of ports. War itself would become more fatal to neutral States than to belligerent interests.

"The rule of feudal times, the starvation of beleaguered and fortified towns, might be extended to an entire population of an open country. It is a return to barbaric habits of war. It might equally be claimed that all peaceful men of arms-bearing age could be deported, because otherwise they might be added to the military forces of the country."

Martinique was neither blockaded nor besieged. It undoubtedly had a British garrison and was a refuge and sometimes a rendezvous for British armed vessels; at the same time it had a large civil population to be fed then, as it is now, largely by the products of the temperate zone. Its predominant character was not that of a port of naval or military equipment.

We do not consider that a provision-laden ship bound for Martinique was properly condemned on the ground alone that she was bound to a British port, nor do we consider the fact that the port had once been French complicates the situation. There is nothing in the law of nations which justifies or makes valid as against neutrals such decrees as those issued during this war by the French and English. Russia admitted these decrees were contrary to the law of nations. France promised to pay for captures made under them. England and Spain did pay the United States. (See authorities cited in Gray, adm'r, v. U. S., 21 C. Cls. R., p. 340.)

If either party desired to reduce the other by starvation there was a plain and acknowledged legal method to obtain that end; that is, by the establishment of an effective blockade. That neither was able to take this course is not a reason that the commerce of neutrals should be suspended on the penalty of having their merchant vessels and cargoes confiscated. To admit such a doctrine would be to impose in time of war a worse burden upon the neutral than that borne by either belligerent, and would shut it up in its own ports, or oblige it to furnish, in protection of its commerce, a naval force competent to compete with the belligerent, which by paper decrees, unsupported by effective acts by its municipal law, attempts to interfere with the recognized and natural rights of neutral trade.

We do not understand that in the negotiations of 1800 the French denied the justice of claims similar in principle to the one now suggested, and the treaty of 1778 in terms conceded the right to trade with the enemy. The commerce of the United States was principally in agricultural products, certainly not in munitions of war. A most important complaint was as to that part of the belligerent decrees which directed seizure of neutral property on the sole ground of destination to an enemy port without regard to the character of the cargo. (See Treaty Commerce 1778, Articles XII, XIII, XXIII, XXIV.)

It seems to us clear that this class of claims was contemplated by the treaty of 1800 and the act of 1885.

BURDEN OF PROOF IN PRIZE PROCEEDINGS.

The burden of proof in prize proceedings is on the seized vessel. The authorities concur in this general statement, but the principle is not technical and is not to be pushed beyond its proper natural intent. Seized vessels always appear before the court under the taint of suspicion; that taint it is incumbent upon them to remove, as it is in their power alone to do so. What the court looks for is the fact. If it appear that the vessel was innocently pursuing an honest and legal voyage, whether that appear by papers or otherwise, then the vessel should be released. No particular papers, no specified character of evidence is marked out and defined as indispensable to attain this end.

A case is easily supposable in which a merchant vessel has lost its papers by an accident, or by theft, or by robbery committed by a pirate or privateer, or through suppression by the captor, and it would not be admitted—the fact of their non-production being explained, and the vessel's honest character being shown—that because some particular document was not on board she therefore should be condemned and confiscated. The onus probandi is on the captured vessel; which means no more than that she must explain away suspicious circumstances.

REPRISALS.

The learned counsel for the defense contend that the United States first violated the treaties of 1778 by the proclamation of neutrality of 1793, by refusing to guaranty the French possessions, by refusing to grant the promised harbor privileges, and by concluding the Jay treaty. Therefore "it was the right of France to retaliate upon the United States for these violations; and whatever she did, or whatever was done by her authority in such retaliation prior to and during the limited war existing between the two countries, whether by captures, seizures, condemnations, or confiscations of American property, vessels or cargoes, was justifiably done."

In another form substantially the same contention is made, defendants claiming that the acts of France complained of by the United States were authorized by the law of nations; that whether reparation was to be made by France depended upon compliance with her demands; that as the United States did not acquiesce in those demands, but by the annulling act of July, 1798, practically notified France that they would not do so, "from that moment France owed no compensation for those confiscations and the matter was res judicata."

In considering these propositions it will strike any one who has studied the correspondence or will refer to the extracts made from it by us in this and our previous opinions on the spoliations question, that France never took this point. It will be remembered that the decrees at the outset were admitted by all parties to be illegal, and excusable only on the ground of necessity; that while this admission was not by any means consistently adhered to, still England and Spain came back to it in effect when they compensated the United States for losses—England through a commission organized under the provision of the Jay treaty, Spain in the treaties relative to the Florida purchase.

France did not seriously ask us to enforce the guaranty and apparently did not wish us to do so, however much we may have feared such a demand on her part, and however much some of her agents and her colonists may have desired it. The vital point of difference was the Jay treaty. We have already discussed that instrument and stated that it was in conflict with the provisions in the Franco-American treaties of 1778. France did not contend that the Jay treaty abrogated the treaties of 1778; on the contrary, her whole argument, down to the ratification of the treaty of 1800, was based upon the premise that the treaties were of enduring force. The decree itself which ordered seizure of neutral property bound in United States vessels to enemy ports, set forth as a reason for its enactment that the Jay treaty modified, not annulled, the treaties with France, and that France was entitled under the treaties to any benefit this modification might give her.

France did not deny at any point of the negotiations which led to the treaty of 1800 her liability for claims known by the generic name of "spoliations," but claimed in return for payment recognition of treaties, a demand which was not granted, and the contention remained embodied in the second article, which was stricken out. Thus was completed what Madison called the "bargain" by which we released "spoliations" in consideration of release from all obligations founded upon the treaties of 1778. A striking illustration of the French position, if any is needed after the detailed statement of the negotiations which has heretofore been made, is found in Article IV of the treaty of 1800, which agrees to return prizes captured under the decrees, now termed by the defense decrees of retaliation, when those prizes had not been already definitively condemned.

Acts of retaliation are admitted to be justifiable under certain circumstances. They may exist when the two nations are otherwise at peace, but they are in their nature acts of warfare. They depart from the field of negotiation into that of force, and, as is war, are justified by a successful result. To term the decrees of France and the acts of their privateers under them "acts of reprisal" does not alter the facts or the legal position. That position has been defined by the Supreme Court of the United States as limited partial war. We, following the path indicated by that tribunal, have defined it as "limited war in its nature similar to a prolonged series of reprisals."

The result of that partial limited war, the result of the negotiations for settlement, the agreement reached by the two parties which made the Government of the United States liable over to its citizens, we have heretofore considered so much in detail that we shall not now repeat it, and we need only state briefly the result heretofore reached by us, and in which we, after re-examination, are confirmed, that the acts of France now in question, whether called "reprisals" or acts of limited warfare, were contended by the United States to be illegal, were admitted so to be by France; that France stood ready to make the compensation made by England and Spain for similar acts on their part, provided we would admit certain claims of her own, which we declined to do; and finally, by the substitution of the existing second article of the treaty for that agreed upon by the negotiators, these claims were surrendered in consideration of a release from the French demand.

SALVAGE.

The case of the Two Brothers presents a claim for salvage paid an American man-of-war for rescue from a French privateer.

The broad principle of prize law forbids an allowance by way of salvage to the captor of a neutral in possession of a belligerent. The reason of the rule is plain: salvage is remuneration for aid in case of danger, and a neutral vessel in the hands of a civilized belligerent is not in danger, for it is to be presumed that, if innocent, she will be discharged by the prize-court with damages for detention. Some of the prize-courts in France were at certain times during the disturbed period between 1792 and 1801 very fair and just in their treatment of neutral property. We have in our opinions on the spoliations cited instances of a reasonable judicial application of the law.

Unfortunately, however, the fair administration of justice, which before the Revolution and since has characterized the learned and able officials who have there filled the offices of the magistrature, was interrupted during the period now under consideration. Setting aside the charges made of ulterior and improper motives on the part of individual magistrates of which illustrations are found in the letters of Monroe, Mountflorence, and Pickering (supra), we need only recall that the decrees of the French or colonial governments were binding upon the prize tribunals, and those tribunals were obliged to enforce them. Many of the decrees were in conflict with the law of nations and were an invasion of the rights of neutrals. The position assumed by the French authorities placed neutrals prosecuting innocent voyages in a most dangerous position. If taken by a French privateer they were not to expect a trial under the recognized law of nations, but a trial under arbitrary and illegal municipal enactments; a trial which would necessarily result in condemnation, even if the local tribunal were above suspicion of improper prejudice.

Under these circumstances the reason fails for the rule as to salvage in case of recapture of a neutral from a belligerent. As the neutral was in danger of condemnation, so the recapturing vessel was entitled to salvage. We have already cited the opinion of Lord Stowell, who, at the time of the occurrences from which these claims arose, found it just and necessary to adopt this rule.

The Supreme Court of the United States have declared that to support a demand for salvage two circumstances must concur—the taking must be lawful and there must be a meritorious service rendered to the recaptured. Commenting on Lord Stowell's opinion as to the necessity for meritorious service, the court say:

"The principle is that without benefit salvage is not payable; and it is merely a consequence from this principle which exempts recaptured neutrals from its payment. But let a nation change its laws and its practice on this subject; let its legislation be such as to subject to condemnation all neutrals captured by its cruisers, and who will say that no benefit is conferred by a recapture? In such a course of things the state of the neutral is completely changed. So far from being safe, he is in as much danger of condemnation as if captured by his own declared enemy. A series of decisions then, and of rules founded on his supposed safety, no longer apply. Only those rules are applicable which regulate a situation of actual danger. This is not, as it has been termed, a change of principle, but a preservation of principle by a practical application of it according to the original, substantial good sense of the rule."

The court then inquire whether the laws of France were such as to have rendered the condemnation of a neutral in possession of a French prize crew so probable as to create a case of such real danger that her recapture must be considered as a meritorious service authorizing allowance as salvage. On this point the conclusion is reached that the danger of loss was real and imminent.

"The captured vessel was of such description that the law by which she was to be tried condemned her as good prize to the captor. Her danger then was real and imminent. The service rendered her was an essential service, and the court is therefore of opinion that the recaptor is entitled to salvage." (Talbot vs. Seeman, case of the Amelia, 1 Cr., p. 1.)

We see no reason why a rule laid down by such eminent authority, so just in principle, and the result of such sound judicial reasoning, should not be applied to the cases now before us.

FREIGHT.

The Nancy was under charter to sail from Baltimore to Jamaica, there to discharge cargo, reload, and return to Baltimore. While on her way to Jamaica under this charter-party she was seized on the high seas by a French privateer and lost to her owners. The question is now presented as to the basis upon which an allowance for freight should be computed.

It is evident that freight earned is an element of value in the property lost. The ship-owner has a right to expect a reasonable return upon his venture, and this return he finds only in the freight money. As between the vessel and the cargo-owner the freight is regarded as an entirety due in no part until the arrival of the vessel at the port of destination. Between these two alone does this rule prevail—as to them the law has placed a certain construction upon the contract of affreightment to which they are parties—a construction well understood, admitted, and certain.

As to third parties no such rule prevails, and as against them freight is often recoverable, even when the vessel does not reach her destination. In cases of tort, such as collision, Dr. Lushington says: "The party who had suffered the injury is clearly entitled to an adequate compensation for any loss he may sustain for the detention of the vessel during the period which is necessary for the completion of the repairs and furnishing the new articles (2 W. Robinson, 279), and he allowed gross freight less the ordinary ship's expenses necessary to earn it. As a broad rule this is well enough, but it is not without possible exception, for we may imagine an injury at a time when the vessel is not engaged in freight earning, although even then we probably look to the market for a proper measure of damages.

The case of The Amiable Nancy (3 Wheaton, 560), and Smith vs. Condry (1 Howard, 35), allowed only the "actual damage sustained by the party at the time and place of injury" without allowance for detention. In Williamson vs. Barrett (13 Howard, 101), a collision case, the court allowed damages for demurrage, adopting the rate of freight, less expenses, as a proper measure, three justices dissenting on the ground that the majority rule introduced too much uncertainty into the case and tended to increase the "stringency, tediousness, and charges of litigation in collision cases." They therefore preferred a rule granting full damages at the time and place of collision, with legal interest on the amount thus ascertained.

The case of the Baltimore, arising from collision, was decided in 1869 (8 Wall., 377), the court holding that the suffering party is not limited to compensation for the immediate effects of the injury inflicted, but the claim for compensation may extend to loss of freight, necessary expenses incurred in making repairs, and unavoidable detention. Restitutio in integram is the leading maxim in such cases, say the court, and in respect to materials for repairs where repairs are practicable there shall not, as in insurance cases, be any deduction for new materials in place of old, for this reason, that "the claim of the injured party arises by reason of the wrongful act of the party by whom the damage was occasioned, and the measure of the indemnity is not limited by any contract, but is coextensive with the amount of damage. * * * Allowance for freight is made in such a case, reckoning the gross freight less the charges which would necessarily have been incurred in earning the same, and which were saved to the owner by the accident, together with interest on the same from the date of the probable termination of the voyage."

In case of capture the general rule is that the neutral carrier of enemy's property is entitled to his freight (Story, J., in the Comerceen, 1 Gallison, 264). Sir William Scott held very firmly by this rule in the case of Der Mohr (3 C. Rob., 129, and 4 C. Rob., 315), a case of great hardship, appealing strongly to the sympathy of the court. In that case he said:

"In an unfortunate case like the present the court would certainly be disposed to give the captor all possible relief. I need not add that no relief is possible which can not be given consistently with the justice due to the claimant. The demand of freight is, I apprehend, an absolute demand in cases where the ship is pronounced to be innocently employed. * * *

"The freight is as much a part of the loss as the ship, for he (the captor) was bound to answer equally for both. The captor has, by taking possession of the whole cargo, deprived the claimant of the fund to which his security was fixed. He was bound to bring in that cargo subject to the demand for freight. He was just as answerable for the freight of the voyage as for the ship which was to earn it, or which was rather to be considered as having already earned it. In the room of this fund the captor has substituted his own personal responsibility, for loss accrues by the fault of his agent. I see no distinction under which I can pronounce that the claimant is not as much entitled to the freight as to the vessel." (See also 1 Gallison, 274, the Anna Green.)

Upon an open insurance policy gross freight is recoverable (2 Phillips Ins., § 1238). As to insurance, the inchoate right to freight vests directly "the ship has broken ground on the voyage described in the charter-party," and there is an insurable interest "where there is an expectancy coupled with a present existing title" (Lucena vs. Crawford, 2 Boss. and Pull. N. R., 269; 1 Phillips Ins., § 334, p. 192).

Freight, then, is properly insurable and collectible. It has value, although the right as against the freighter may be inchoate until delivery. As to the freighter the ship-owner is without redress, unless there be delivery in accordance with the contract, but as to an insurer or a tort-feasor, there is a right to redress upon the happening of an interruption of the voyage.

The amount of that redress and the method of computing it in the cases now submitted to us of illegal capture are now to be decided. The ship-owner has a right to a reasonable return upon his investment, for the risk to which his property is subjected, for its depreciation while engaged in the undertaking, and for the expenses to which he is subjected in carrying it out. The measure of that return, based upon the theory of a completed voyage, he has himself fixed in his contract of affreightment. If his voyage be not completed, but be interrupted and his property lost by the act of a wrongdoer, then, as against that wrongdoer, the maxim restitutio in integrum applies.

If the voyage were completed the difficulty would not be serious, for as a guide we should have a contract made by parties opposed in interest and familiar with the business. As the voyage has not been completed, an allowance of gross freight would be more than a restitutio in integrum, and would neglect a deduction for expenses necessarily to be incurred in completing the contract and in conveying the cargo to the point of delivery. To allow gross freight under these circumstances would in effect not merely reimburse the owner, but render the seizure a matter of profit to him, and we do not understand that punitive damages should be recovered in the cases now before us. The vessel having been destroyed before the completion of the voyage, has not been so long employed as the contract contemplated, her crew have received less wages, and her hull and outfit have received less deterioration. She has only earned freight pro tanto.

On the other hand, the expenses of freight earning are much greater at the beginning of the voyage than at any other period, for then advances are made seamen, stores are shipped, port charges and the cost of loading have to be met. Therefore, to divide the total freight by the number of days out of port would not be fair to the ship-owner; to deduct from the total freight the cost of the voyage from the place of destruction to port of destination would be a fairer rule, could those expenses be ascertained.

To compute the amount of this freight in each instance is practically impossible, so that the court is forced to the adoption of some general rule which in our opinion is fair in result. The difficulty is not a novel one, and the method of solution not without precedent. Those familiar with the proceedings of prize courts know that a substantially arbitrary rule is there often adopted in practice to enforce justice, and now, nearly a hundred years after the events from which these claims arise, when all witnesses are dead and many records destroyed, we are forced to this course, as it is evidently impossible to estimate in every instance precisely the proportion of freight earned. Where such an estimate can be made we shall make it, in other cases we shall adopt a general rule.

In seeking for such a rule, we learn that in commercial cities, in the adjustment of average losses, there is a practice to award arbitrarily two-thirds of the full freight on the immediate voyage. This course was in effect followed by the commissioners under the treaty of 1831 with France, who made a similar allowance as a fair measure of the increase in value of the cargo by reason of the distance to which it had been transported at the time of capture; and the award was made to the shipper if he had paid freight; to the ship-owner if the freight had not been paid.

After carefully examining the cases before us we conclude that this rule is substantially just, and we adopt it.

This brings us to another point. The Nancy was under charter for a round voyage—Baltimore to Jamaica and return. She was destroyed on the outward voyage. Is she entitled to an allowance for freight based upon the entire contract contained in the charter-party?

As against an insurer or tort-feasor the inchoate right to freight vests when the vessel breaks ground "on the voyage described in the charter-party" (supra). An insurable interest in freight can not spring from a mere "expectancy," but may spring from an "expectancy" when this is coupled with "a present existing title." (Lucena vs. Crawford, supra.)

In cases of general average for jettison, Lowndes states the rule to be that "when a ship is chartered to fetch or carry a cargo belonging to the charterer, the freight under the charter must contribute to the general average, whether or not the cargo is on board the ship at the time of the general average act, since the loss of the chartered ship, whether laden or not, would deprive the ship-owner of his expected freight." (Lowndes on General Average, 236.)

It has been held in this country that where a gross sum was to be paid as freight for a voyage out and return, the principal object of the voyage being to obtain a return cargo, the freight for the whole trip must contribute to general average on the outward voyage. (The Mary, 1 Sprague's Decisions, 17.) The same rule has been adopted in cases of salvage. (The Nathanial Hooper, 3 Sumner, 542; The Progress, Edwards, 210; The Dorothy Foster, 6 C. Rob., 88; see also Livingston vs. Columbia Insurance Company, 3 Johns N. Y., 49; Hart vs. Delaware Insurance Company, 2 Wash. C. C., 346).

The decisions on this question in the United States do not go so far as those in England, but we lean to the doctrine of Sir William Scott and Dr. Lushington, as better applicable to the cases now before us, that when a vessel is actually under contract for a voyage from one port to another, thence to proceed to a third, she has such "a present existing title" in the freight money of the entire voyage as to authorize a recovery based upon the total freight money for the round trip.

Of course she is not entitled to gross freight, and we must not be understood as intending any application of this principle to a vessel proceeding under a mere "expectancy" of finding cargo at her first port of call. The principle only covers those cases where there is an assurance of freight from her first port of call to her second, and a price stipulated to be paid therefor.

We have discussed and ruled upon as many of the general questions submitted in the argument as it seems to us wise now to decide, either for counsels' convenience or in justice to the Government or the claimants. Other points which have arisen in the long argument we shall consider as they are brought before us in specific cases. The object of obtaining from the court a ruling upon general principles is in our opinion now sufficiently attained.

We file herewith, that they may be reported to Congress, our conclusions of fact and law in many cases. This opinion, with those already delivered, contain the conclusions which in our judgment affect the liability of the United States therefor.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 431) granting a pension to Emma S. Free, widow of Thomas S. Free, late major of the United States Army;

A bill (H. R. 8180) to regulate the liens of judgments and decrees of the courts of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 6153) to authorize condemnation of land for sites of public buildings, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 163) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts and officials to the city of Utica, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 8183) for the erection of a public building at Opelousas, La.; and

A bill (H. R. 3008) for the relief of P. A. Leatherbury.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The bill (S. 2713) granting a pension to Pierre Bottineau has been improperly referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It should go to the Committee on Pensions, and if there be no objection that reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Ventilation and Acoustics, presented the following report:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, July 2, 1888.

Resolved, That the Architect of the Capitol be directed to close all perforations in the floor of the Hall of Representatives where such may be practicable and to enlarge the openings in the floor along the walls of the Hall, and to procure seats or sofas to be placed along those walls. The cost of said work and the purchase of seats shall not exceed $,000, to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the House.

Your committee is impressed with the impossibility of keeping the air-ducts of the Hall free from dust and other sources of defilement under the present arrangement. It is proposed, in order to correct this evil, to close all the openings in the floor which may be practicable, and, in order not to cut off the influx of fresh air, to increase the openings in the floor around the walls of the Hall, and such other places as may be found suitable, to an extent at least equal to the area of those closed. The openings around the wall should be covered with seats or sofas similar to those which run diagonally across the floor outside the railing. It is thought that this change will greatly lessen the danger of the air-ducts becoming fouled, as sometimes now happens. The cost of the improvement is estimated at $3,000. Your committee recommend the passage of the resolution.

Mr. LANDES. I ask that the report be printed and laid on the table for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ROOMS FOR SELECT COMMITTEES.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Accounts:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims and the Select Committee on the Eleventh Census be authorized and empowered to retain the use of the committee-room now occupied by them in the Butler Building during the recess and during the second session of this Congress at the same rent as is now paid; and that the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be also authorized to occupy a room in the said building at the rate of $50 per month during the balance of this session and during the recess and the second session of this Congress; and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to pay all of said rent out of the contingent fund of the House.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that on Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, two hours be set apart for the consideration of such measures as may be called up by the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks unanimous consent that on next Saturday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, two hours be set apart for the consideration of measures reported from the Committee on Printing. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PATRICK H. WINSTON, JR.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 212) for the relief of Patrick H. Winston, jr., and that it be now considered in the House.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DUBOIS. In a debate in which I took part a few days ago, in arguing in favor of the amendment introduced by myself, that "a combination of lead ore with silver or gold ore shall not exempt such lead ore from payment of said duty," I inadvertently alluded to the honorable Delegate from Montana in such a way as to give the inference either that he was not in favor of the amendment or that for some reason he did not care to express himself on this floor.

In previous and lengthy conversations with the gentleman from Montana I knew that his sympathies were not only with the amendment but that he intended to so express himself fully. Had he not been unavoidably absent from the Chamber on that day he no doubt would have corrected me at the time.

The interests of his Territory and my own are identical, and I make this correction in fairness to the gentleman and in justice to myself.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McSHANE. Mr. Speaker, before the tariff bill is disposed of I desire to correct a statement made by myself on June 28, when the gentleman from California [Mr. FELTON] occupied the floor making some remarks with reference to the paragraph placing quicksilver on the free-list. During that discussion I made the statement that quicksilver was selling in the San Francisco market at $50 per flask. Upon investigation I find that I was mistaken in that regard, and should have stated, as I intended to state, that it was selling at 50 cents per pound. It is proper that I should make this correction.

TARIFF.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The special order for to-day at half past 11 o'clock is the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to correct a verbal mistake in the bill. During the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole cotton-seed oil was by inadvertence put on the free-list in two places—in line 67 and line 96. I ask unanimous consent to strike out line 67.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] asks unanimous consent to strike out line 67 of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. The same language has been put in in two places.

Mr. BREWER. I object.

Mr. MILLS. I move to amend by striking out the line already indicated, and also by striking out the word "per" in line 191, which is another verbal mistake. It ought to read "one-tenth of 1 cent per pound," but now reads "one-tenth of 1 per cent. per pound." I offer this amendment and move the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is it in order to move an amendment to this bill now?

The SPEAKER. Amendments are in order prior to the demand for the previous question. The gentleman from Texas has offered an amendment and demanded the previous question.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was his amendment in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order to offer amendments prior to the demand for the previous question. The gentleman has moved his amendment, and now demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GROSVENOR. We do not understand what it is.

The SPEAKER. It will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 67 of the bill strikes out the words "oil, cotton-seed;" and in line 191 strike out the word "per," making it read "one-tenth of 1 cent per pound."

Mr. MILLS. These amendments merely correct clerical errors.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, the report of the Treasury Department shows that we have now in the United States over $1,900,000,000 in gold, silver, and paper money. Of this amount, exclusive of bullion, there is securely locked within the vaults of the Treasury the sum of $600,000,000. Of this latter sum one hundred million is set apart to secure the redemption of the Government Treasury notes; one hundred and nineteen millions is set apart to secure the redemption of gold certificates; two hundred millions is set apart to secure the redemption of silver certificates, and ninety-eight millions to secure the redemption of banks which have failed or are in liquidation. After all demands against the Government have been provided for there is left a balance of $129,000,000, which represents the sum wrung from the people by excessive and unjust taxation.

When I make this statement, sir, I have said enough to arrest the attention not only of Congress but of the whole country. But this is not all. Under the rates of taxation now existing the excess of receipts over expenditures is increasing over nine millions of dollars per month. To take from the people this large excess not required for any just and necessary expenditure of government, even if done by a just and equitable system of taxation, would be vicious and hurtful enough; but when we remember that taxation is levied not upon the wealth of the country, not upon its lands and houses, its bonds and stocks, its gold and silver, but upon the products of labor, as they go from production to consumption, and consumption necessary to sustain human existence; when we remember that the burden falls heaviest upon those least able to bear it, and that the amount required by law is so much taken from the annual supply that must satisfy the necessary wants of life, and that the sum of the exaction so required is equal to $47.10 on every $100 of taxed articles, it is enough to startle the country and arouse it to action.

But this is not all of the vicious consequences that flow from unjust and excessive taxation. Wrongs never go alone. They are gregari-

ous. They hunt in flocks. This large sum of money extracted from the channels of business circulation and locked up in the Treasury is constantly lowering the price of the products of labor not protected against competition, and while increasing the demands of the tax-gatherer it decreases the ability of the tax-payer to comply with those demands. Every one knows that the price of commodities in the market is fixed by the amount of money in actual circulation, and when the circulation is depleted prices fall, property shrinks in value, and loans and mortgages increase. The load grows heavier on the back of the debtor, and his pathway grows darker and his struggle harder day by day.

Those who have means, and who have been excused from sharing with their fellow-citizens the burdens of taxation, find their fortunes improved, while the less favored citizen, who must live by his daily toil, finds himself anxiously inquiring how he is to obtain employment and support for himself and those dependent on him. Depleting the channels of circulation necessarily arrests consumption. When ability to buy the things that want requires is decreasing the demand for them will decrease in the same proportion, and when the demand decreases the production will correspondingly decrease. Then employment is restricted, laborers are reduced or discharged, and suffering, distress, and discontent are seen on every hand.

What, then, is to become of the manufacturing laborer? He has no income to draw upon. If he has, it is a small one he has laid up with a frugal hand, and it is soon gone. He must wander around and hunt employment, and in its stead find hunger confronting him at every corner. What is to become of that large body of laborers engaged in carrying the products of labor from the producer to the consumer when production and consumption are restricted and dwarfed? This, sir, is the peril that menaces the country to-day. With the one hundred and twenty-nine millions now piled up in the Treasury, and with contraction of the circulation going on at the rate of more than nine millions a month, how long will it be before stagnation and death will follow, and bankruptcy and ruin stalk together through the land?

Sir, that is a question we must consider. If this contraction continues at the present rate it can not be long before the threatened disaster reaches us; but the time of its coming none can tell. It is enough for us to know that the country is in a perilous situation and that it is yet in our power to avert the peril. Aptly and well did the President in his message define the situation when he said it was not a question of theory, but a question of condition, that confronted us. On this side we have made an honest effort to relieve this condition of affairs. We have brought before the House a bill which will lessen the inflow of money into the public treasury and permit the excess to remain where it rightfully belongs, in the pockets of the people. By existing law the average rate of taxation on dutiable goods imported is $47.10 on every $100 worth.

The bill now pending when reported by the Committee on Ways and Means reduced the average rate from $47.10 to $40. But the amendments which have been adopted in the Committee of the Whole have restored to the dutiable list many articles which we had placed upon the free list, and raised the duties on other articles which we had reduced, so that the average rate of duty on dutiable goods by the bill as amended is now $42.49 on every $100 worth imported. This is $4.61 reduction on the present average rates on each $100 worth imported.

The total reductions on the revenues derived from imports by the bill as amended amounts to $50,591,636, of which $30,832,791 are reductions on the dutiable list and $19,758,845 are reductions from articles placed on the free list. These are small reductions exceedingly moderate, yet this bill has been stigmatized as a free-trade measure. A proposition to make a reduction amounting to less than $5 in a hundred is met with a storm of denunciation and characterized by the combined interest protected against competition as a free trade proposition that is to ruin all the manufacturing interests of the country. Is $42.29 of taxation on every $100 worth of dutiable goods imported free trade? It seems to me an enormous rate of taxation. It is a rate of taxation that if levied on the wealth of the country would not be permitted to stand for one hour. What State in the Union imposes a rate of taxation equal to 5 per cent.?

Taxation in the States is levied on lands, houses, bonds, stocks, notes, horses, cattle; in short, on all kinds of property. The owner sees and realizes fully what he is doing when he pays taxes on his property, and no party and no administration could remain in power one hour in any State in the Union that would impose a tax of $5 on the $100 of property. It could not be collected. It would produce insurrection. But a tax of $42.49 levied on the products of labor, and concealed and disguised by the methods of indirection adopted in its collection is boldly proclaimed a free-trade measure. In a majority of the States the rate of taxation does not reach $1 on the $100 for State and county purposes, and there are but few cities in the United States, extravagant as they generally are in their municipal administrations, that support a taxation of 3 per cent.

And yet this bill, carrying a taxation of $42.49 per cent., is characterized as a "free-trade measure." The term "free-trade" seems to have a double meaning. Some gentlemen seem to understand that free-trade means an absolute exemption of our foreign commerce from all taxation. Gentlemen on this side of the House and the Democratic party in all its history have used the term free-trade to mean freedom of our foreign commerce from all obstruction save that of just and necessary taxation for the support of an honest and economical administration of the Government. [Applause.]

The tariff of 1846 was framed to raise revenue and for that purpose only, and it was called by both parties a free-trade tariff. The tariff of 1857 was a still lower tariff and framed for revenue purposes alone, and it was called a free-trade tariff. But nobody ever contended for the abandonment of the policy born with the Government of raising revenue by duties on imports. I have often spoken of these tariffs as free-trade tariffs, and the decade from 1850 to 1860 as a free-trade decade, because under these tariffs and during that time the foreign commerce of the United States was not then fettered by obstructions in the interest of individuals and monopolists. [Applause.]

But let us examine the schedule of this bill and see if we can find any free trade concealed in them. We have not touched the liquor schedule, nor the silk schedule, because we thought that those who used the articles embraced in these could afford to pay the duties levied on them by existing law. The tobacco schedule has been stricken from the bill in the Committee of the Whole.

We have tried to reduce the duties upon the necessaries of life, because the great body of the people are compelled to have them.

The first schedule is that of drugs and chemicals. The average rate of duty by existing law is 32.87 per cent. We reduce it to 28.17, or a reduction of $4.70 in the hundred. They say that will destroy the domestic manufacture. Why? Because labor is so much cheaper in foreign countries. But the whole labor cost is only 10.9 per cent. If the labor cost here was 100 per cent. higher than in foreign countries, which it is not, then 6 per cent. would fully cover the difference, but we leave 28.17, more than twice the entire labor cost. Is there any danger to chemical industry in a reduction of 4.7 per cent.? The demand of the Government for revenue will more than double the entire labor cost, so that the labor is not endangered. But it seems a little strange that as the tariff is levied to protect American labor and the protection is 32.87, that the laborer only gets 10.9. There seems to be a leak somewhere.

The next is earthen and glass ware. The duty under the existing law is $59.55 on every $100; by this bill it is $52.17. And this is free trade, too. A reduction of $7.38 on a hundred, and leaving a tax upon the consumer of $52.17 in every $100 worth of product imported into the country, will shut up the glass and earthen ware business they say, and they call that free trade.

Mr. Speaker, if $52.17 taxation on $100 worth of property imported into the United States from foreign countries is free trade, in God's name will some one tell me what is meant by the term protection? [Applause.] Well, these manufacturers are alarmed about cheap foreign labor, too, and they want protection enough, they say, to cover the difference between wages in Europe and here. One of our consuls in England tells us that the average labor cost of earthenware in the United States in 1882 was 46½ per cent., and in Staffordshire, England, 47½ per cent. If this be true, our labor is cheaper than the foreign. But if the foreign labor cost nothing, then we have left per cent. enough to pay the whole labor cost of our manufactures. The labor cost of earthen and glass ware, as shown by the census of 1880, was 41 per cent. and we have left 52.17 per cent. Why is it that all of that 59.55 per cent. did not get to the laborer, only 41 per cent. having found its way to his pocket?

The next schedule is metals. We have reduced the duties from an average of 40.77 per cent. under the present tariff to 38.47 under the pending bill. This is a reduction of $2.30 on $100 worth of imported metals. There is nothing revolutionary in that, nothing to excite alarm, and it is a long way yet to free-trade. A reduction on pig-iron from 56.00 to 50.50 per cent. still leaves it with a heavy duty, and the tax of $6 per ton which we propose is the war tariff rate of 1863. The reduction of the duty on steel rails from 84.33 per cent. to 54.57 leaves a duty higher than it was from 1865 to 1870. It was then 45 per cent. In 1870 the duty was changed to a specific rate of $28 per ton. The equivalent ad valorem was then about 28 per cent. It seemed a reduction. Doubtless it was done under the pretense of preventing undervaluation and fraud; that is the false pretense under which specific duties masquerade; but when English rails came down to $26.69 per ton in 1879 the duty on steel rails, though remaining the same per ton, amounted to 104 per cent. Why should the present exorbitant duty be retained? Steel rails can be made as cheaply in this country as in England or elsewhere.

I received a letter a few days ago from a gentleman engaged in steel manufacture who said he could make the best cutlery steel in Alabama at a total cost of $16 per ton and at a labor cost of $3 per ton. The average price of the steel rails imported last year was $20.16 per ton. From 1875 to 1878, inclusive, steel rails were cheaper in the United States than in England, and cheaper here because they could be produced at a lower cost here than in Europe. And if they could be made cheaper here for four years, why not all the time? From 1875 to 1878 the importation fell from 43,000 tons to 2 tons. The average English price last year was $20.16; the average American price for the same time was $37.13; difference in price, $16.97; tariff duty, $17! Now, if the Steel Rail Association could make rails as cheap in the United States in 1878 as they could be made in England, they could do it in 1887, and the $16.97 difference in price was put in the pockets of the manufacturer. It is claimed to be in the interest of the laborer, but he only gets from $3 to $5 per ton; the balance goes to the manufacturer to make millionaires of men that they may build castles in Scotland and go coaching through her mountains. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have reduced the duty on steel rails to $11 per ton. It is equivalent to more than double the entire labor cost of the rails. Why should not this reduction be made. There is but one reply all along the line. It is free trade. On wood and woodenware we found the present rates averaging 18 per cent. and we reduced them to 17.40 per cent. That is too small to require further notice.

On sugar we reduced the rate from 78.15 per cent. to 62.31 per cent. This is the largest reduction made on any schedule except the woolen. The reduction of the revenue on sugar proposed by the bill is $11,759,799, and excepting the woolen schedule is nearly twice as much as all the others combined. That is a heavy cut, but nobody seems to be distressed about it.

The complaint about sugar is that we did not reduce enough. We have dealt more harshly with sugar than with any article we have left on the dutiable list. Yet gentlemen on the other side tell us we have been sectional; that we have protected sugar and rice and aimed at the destruction of Northern industries. The charge is absurd. We have not looked at the section where any article is produced in order to determine what we would do. We have tried to deal fairly with all, and in doing it we find that we have cut it far heavier than iron, or glass, or earthenware, or woolens, or cottons, or hemp, or jute, or flax. In short, the cut on sugar is nearly twice as much as all the others put together, except woolens. [Applause.] But, on correct principles of taxation, there ought to be a higher duty on sugar than on any other article on the dutiable list.

As Democrats, we believe that a tax is a tribute from the private property of a citizen exacted by law for the support of Government. We believe, with the commentators and economists, that it is a burden, and that it ought to be so laid as to be as light as possible on the tax-payer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we get by the present duty on sugar and molasses about $58,000,000 per annum. According to the estimate of the gentleman on the other side who offered the amendment providing for free sugar and a bounty to the sugar-grower, the present rate of duty affords protection to the domestic sugar-grower equal to $6,000,000; so that the whole cost to the people is $64,000,000. In order to get $62,000,000 of revenue from manufactures of iron and steel, and woolen and cotton goods, the people have to pay $500,000,000 to $600,000,000. We produced in 1880 $670,000,000 of all manufactures of iron and steel. It is certainly over $700,000,000 now. We produced about $275,000,000 each of cotton and woolen goods. These figures I have from the Bureau of Statistics.

Now if protection protects, and that is what it is for, it increases the price of the domestic product nearly as much as the price of the imported product plus the duty. This is admitted by the gentlemen who offered the proposition for the sugar bounty and by those who supported him. This is admitted by the constant arguments made by the other side, that if we reduce cottons and woolens and iron and steel to 40 per cent. they will be ruined. This argument admits they are getting more than that now. Of these three branches of manufactures we are producing to-day fully $1,400,000,000 worth. If they are protected 40 per cent. it costs the people $560,000,000 to get $60,000,000.

Now, which is the better tax to keep, the one that brings $58,000,000 with $6,000,000 of bounty, or that which brings $60,000,000 of revenue with $560,000,000 of bounty. Believing that a tax is a burden, and that it ought to be as light as possible to the tax-payers, I would keep a high duty on sugar and lower the duties on cotton goods, woolens, and manufactures of iron and steel. If the rate of 40 per cent. on these three articles only raised the price of the domestic produce 30 per cent. it would increase their cost to the people over $400,000,000. Why then should we repeal the duty on sugar and keep the high duties on the others. The duties on the others ought to be lowered and the duty on sugar ought to be put at the revenue standard and kept there.

The duty on provisions by existing law is 24.33 per cent., and we leave it at 23.39. The reduction is 94 cents in a hundred dollars. This is a very moderate reduction. We might have gone further without injury to any interest.

The average rate of duty on manufactures of cotton by existing law is 39.99 per cent. We leave it by the pending bill at 39.07. A difference of 92 cents in a hundred dollars will hardly drive the cotton manufacturing industry off this continent. The whole labor cost in cotton manufactures averages 21.6 per cent., and there is but little difference between this country and England in the labor cost of cotton goods. But if England paid nothing for her labor, we have left duty enough to nearly double the labor cost here. The present revennes from cotton goods is nearly $12,000,000. We reduce it $277,000. Where does the free-trade skeleton hide in this schedule?

Hemp, jute, and flax goods we found at $28.10 in the existing law, and we leave them at $21.94. There is a reduction of something over $6 in the hundred, but that occurs by putting a large number of items of hemp, flax, jute, manilla, and sun and sisal grass on the free list. Still the reduction is very small.

Now we come to wools and woolens. We found the duty on that schedule under the existing law averaging $58.81, and we have left it at $38.69; a reduction of $20 on every $100 worth. This reduction seems large, but it was caused by eliminating wool from the calculation and putting it on the free list. The reduction on dutiable woolen goods amounts to $12,000,000. But the woolen manufacturer is not injured; he is benefited. The woolen manufacturer by the existing law gets compensation for the taxation on wool and 35 per cent. protection for the manufactured product. By our bill we give him free wool and 40 per cent. protection on his manufactured goods. Instead of being injured, he is positively benefited to the amount of $5 in the hundred more than he is by the existing law. I want to read at this point what the woolen manufacturers said to Congress a number of years ago. In 1866 they addressed a communication to the United States Revenue Commissioner to be submitted to Congress, in which they said:

> The committee do not hesitate to affirm that, independently of considerations of general public policy demanding a duty on wool, the woolen manufacturers of this country would prefer the total abolition of the specific duties, provided they could have all their raw material duty free and an actual net protection of 25 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is signed by the executive committee of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, and by John L. Hayes, their secretary.

After the internal-revenue tax was placed upon the domestic production the manufacturers came and said to Congress: "Now we want compensation for this, too." They had compensation for the tax on wool, and now they wanted compensation for the tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the internal-revenue laws. The duty was raised to 35 per cent.; but they are fine diplomatists, and a short time after that they came before Congress and got the internal-revenue tax on woolen goods repealed. But the 35 per cent. still remains, although they had said that 25 per cent. protection was all they wanted. Now we give them free wool and 40 per cent. protection, and still they say to us "Your bill is a free-trade measure." [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

On the schedule embracing books, papers, etc., the duty under existing law is $22.13, and we left it at $22.06, a reduction of less than 10 cents on a hundred dollars.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have gone through with the schedules of the bill and I come to the free list. We have placed upon the free list articles amounting in round numbers to $20,000,000. The largest item is wool, $6,390,000. Why have we put wool on the free list? They say that this is full free-trade. They say to us, "When you strike wool out of the taxable list you have shot out the middle link in the chain and the chain is parted." Is that true? Why, sir, somebody put cotton on the free list a few years ago. They shot the middle link out and parted the chain then. There were millions of our fellow-citizens who were affected by that missing link in the chain of protection, but the chain was parted, and parted by gentlemen on the other side of the House, who have been so loudly crying free-trade at us. It is our greatest exporting product; it gives employment to millions of laborers. It had a duty of 3 cents a pound, but they removed it and put cotton on the free list, and they did right. There could be no justification for its tax, as there can be none for a tax on wool.

In 1872 hides were put on the free list and by the same party that boasts itself the special champion and friend of protection. Did the chains part then? This is a great cattle-growing country. It is a great sheep-growing country. We produce all sorts of hides.

But when we propose to touch wool, which affords in winter the clothing of 60,000,000 people, we strike at the combination that has made this protective tariff, and they say, "You shall not touch it; that is free trade." Let us see whether it is or not. The first tariff law that ever was enacted by this Government after the Constitution was adopted—the joint product of Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, Thomas Jefferson, and George Washington—embraced in its title the declaration of the principle that it was made to encourage home industries; and the method adopted by them to carry out that policy was to put wool on the free list. There it remained until 1824, the fathers and founders of this Government never proposing to disturb it during all that time. And in all that grand array of talent there was only one, perhaps, who could have been accused of leaning toward free trade; and that was he who wrote the great Declaration, and in one line o fit indicted the King of Great Britain and arraigned him before the bar of mankind for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We are proposing to reduce the price of woolen goods by taking the tax off wool. It is not raised by skilled labor. It scarcely employs any labor at all. There has been a great deal of sympathy manifested on the other side for the sheep. They tell us by heavily taxing the wool more wool will grow on the back of the sheep. It is the back of the man we are caring for on this side of the House, and we propose to bring down the price of woolen clothing so that poor people can get enough to wear in winter. But we are met at the threshhold with a proposition from the other side to increase the duties on wool and woolen manufactures $16,000,000. This would practically prohibit the importation of either wool or woolen goods.

Embraced in this schedule which they demand is one of the most remarkable propositions that has ever been submitted to a legislative body, and that is that the cheap wool that now comes in as carpet wool shall not be manufactured into clothing, as it is being done to day, because the better wool is kept out of the country now by high duties. How is this law if enacted to be carried out? Are we to have Pinkerton detectives examining people's clothing, and if some garments are made of carpet wool, instead of clothing wool grown on American ranches by alien flock-masters, are the garments to be taken off the back of the people and confiscated? Our people are to day wearing carpet wool in their clothing because the duty on the clothing wool keeps it out. Out of 114,000,000 pounds of wool imported in 1887, over 80,000,000 pounds was carpet wool.

And now the wool manufacturers and wool-growers' associations, and their allies are determined that we shall not even wear carpet wool. On the 14th day of last January they met in this city, in "a dark-lantern room," and agreed on a schedule that raises the duties on wool and woolen goods so high that neither can be imported. Now, what are our people to do for woolen clothing? Mr. Dodge, the statistician of the Agricultural Department, and a protectionist, says in his official report that we only grow 265,000,000 pounds of wool. Others say more, but we put it safely when we say our product does not exceed 300,000,000 pounds. Our annual consumption is about 600,000,000 pounds. Now if we refuse the importation of the foreign wool to satisfy the wool growers, and refuse the importation of woolen goods to satisfy the wool manufacturers, what are we to do for clothing? I suppose they expect the people to go naked and vote the Republican ticket. [Applause.] But we say to you we shall have plenty of good woolen clothes. Serve the Lord and vote the Democratic ticket. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, we have put wool on the free list not only to cheapen the clothing of the people, but also in order that we may give to our own workmen in this country the making of the $44,000,000 worth of woolen goods that are annually imported. [Applause.] Instead of importing from $45,000,000 to $50,000,000 worth of woolen goods, which we are now compelled to do because you will not let us import the wool, we propose to admit free all the wool that our people require and let our own people make these woolen goods, and thus increase the demand for their work, and in increasing the demand for their work increase their wages. [Applause.]

Sir, the main object in this bill, the great central feature, is that it is a bill to better the condition and increase the wages of our laboring people. [Applause.] We are the greatest manufacturing people in the world. We are the greatest agricultural people in the world. We are the most skilled people in the world. We are the most intelligent people in the world. We have the handsomest men and the prettiest women in the world. [Laughter and applause.] All we want is for our Government to take its meddling hand out of our business. [Applause on the Democratic side and cries of "That's it," "That's the point."]

We say to the Government: Call upon the people and tell them how much you want to support an honest, economical administration. We will give you what you want for that purpose; we will give it to you cheerfully; but we are not going to be standing around as paupers, craving the protection of political power, when our own intellects are superior to the intellects of any people on the globe. [Applause.] We can not only manufacture all these woolen goods, but we can manufacture our own cotton, two-thirds of which we are now exporting to foreign countries for manufacture and then buying back a large amount of it in the shape of cotton goods.

We are the greatest cotton-growing country in the world; we are the greatest ore-producing nation in the world; we have got all the elements to make us the greatest manufacturing nation on earth. We can give employment, additional employment, to all our wage-workers at fair wages and keep them constantly employed if Congress will only let us alone. [Great applause on the Democratic side.] We ask you to remove as far as you can these barriers. Let us have free raw materials that we may reduce the cost of the product, for the cost of the product is to determine the standing of our goods in the market, and if we can produce an article cheaper than anybody else in the world can produce it we will take the market away from them and hold it against them. [Applause.]

Why, then, should not we have all these raw materials free? Why should not we put our manufacturers upon the same basis with the manufacturers of other countries? Why should not we have the opportunity to contest with them in all the markets of the world? Why should not we demand that this Congress shall undo the work of previous Congresses who have imitated George III, as Mr. Jefferson says in the Declaration of Independence, by cutting off our trade with all parts of the world? Give us a fair field and an open fight and that is all we ask. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, Mr. Speaker, that fair field and open fight we intend to have. [Renewed applause.] We are going to have it, and without trying to "fry the fat" out of anybody either. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

We do not intend to try to debauch the American people with money in order to buy their votes at the polls. We intend to appeal to the intelligence and the virtue of our fellow-citizens. That is the great corner-stone upon which the Republic is founded, and it has been found adequate to all trials in all times in the past, and it will not be wanting now. We intend to appeal to their good common sense and ask for a verdict of approval, and we shall appeal to that great tribunal with an unshaken confidence that it will speak for the welfare and prosperity of the country. [Applause.]

The next largest item is tin-plates, the amount of reduction being $5,700,000. Not a pound of tin-plate is made in the United States. That has been repeatedly stated on this floor; stated from the other side as well as this side. It is clearly an article of revenue. To put tin-plate on the free list does not deprive any man in this country of employment. It does not take a dollar of profit from any manufacturer in the country. In order to meet the condition of the Treasury, which is so alarming, we have taken off this amount of $5,700,000 and given it to the consumers of tin-plate. Gentlemen on the other side say that is free trade, too.

Have you thought how many people are interested in tin-plate? You will find it in the homes of all your poor people. You will find all your workingmen going to their work with tin buckets in their hands carrying their dinners. You will find the manfacturing and canning business of this country carried on by the use of foreign tin-plate. You will find this article everywhere, paying now a duty which does not disturb anybody at all but which is piling too much money into the Treasury and congesting the circulation needed in the channels of business. To remedy this disturbing condition we propose to put this $5,700,000 back into the pockets of the poor people of this country. If that is free trade make the most of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The next item is salt. Salt was put on the free list for the first time by the measure which Thomas Jefferson took part in framing. Salt is not a product of the skill of the human mind or hand. The Builder of the universe has made salt. Salt is in all the multitudinous waters of the sea; salt is beneath our feet in the bowels of the earth; God, in His providence, has made it for man. It is necessary for animal existence. It ought not to be taxed. We have put salt on the free list, so that salt may be free for our great packeries of pork and beef, for our butter makers who are exporting butter largely, for those who cure pork, either for their own use or for the market. This removal of duty affects especially the North and the Northwest. It should commend itself especially to you gentlemen who represent Northwestern constituents who send into the market bacon and pork which we buy from you. But because a few people are interested in having a monopoly of the salt business we are branded before the bar of the country as free-traders when we consent to remove the duty on this article, and give back to the people this bounty which God has prepared for them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Next is the item of burlaps, on which we make a reduction of $978,000. Every yard of this is made in Dundee or in Calcutta, as I am informed. Not a yard of it is made in the United States. The duty upon this article brings money into our coffers which is not needed. It is better that the people who use these burlaps should have this money in the channels of business. The Government does not want it. Money thus unnecessarily placed in the Treasury is injuring the prosperity of the country; and we propose, without disturbing anybody, to reduce this duty on burlaps. They tell us this is free-trade. Every reduction of the tariff which we propose to make is charged as free-trade, and nothing commends itself to the judgment of those who make this charge except that we would couple with reductions on a few little things in the tariff some free whisky. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, what further have we done? We put flax, hemp, and jute on the free list, from which was derived a revenue of $1,700,000. Well, our friends say we ought not to have done that. They say "You are ruining the flax and the hemp industries of this country; "you are ruining industries in which a very large amount of capital has been invested, and we are going to extend these industries and produce sunn and sisal grass after awhile, and we will make a vast field of employment for our people and a profitable industry for the country."

What is the fact? We have been trying this thing for many years, and the industry is passing away with all the fostering care we can bestow upon it. With all the milk we can give to the babe it has refused to prosper, and but a short time ago a gentleman on the other side of the House, when they had made up their minds to starve the little infant sugar that they have nursed so long, said they found that the money they had expended upon it had been utterly thrown away and wasted; sugar refused to be nourished, the little infant was dying, there was not a ghost of a chance for its recovery, and the reason they wanted to throw it aside was that it had ceased to prosper, and they felt justified in slaughtering it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, acting on the principle of their own philosophy, here we have found that the flax, hemp, and jute business, that for years we have been nursing; that for years with all of the paternal care and tenderness that could be bestowed upon it has not prospered, and is passing away; it is dying, it soon must depart; and hence I repeat, in the light of their own philosophy, and learning the lesson from that side of the House, we took it and put it on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Another thing: we have taken opium, $468,000 worth of medicinal opium, a medicine for the relief of the sick and the suffering, not an ounce of it grown in the United States, and that also we put upon the free list. But they do not want free opium; it is whisky they want; they refuse opium altogether. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Have we endangered any one industry by this change? Have we hurt anybody? is there a business enterprise in the United States that will be harmed by it because we give the people cheap medicine, and of the best kind, for the suffering, sick, and perhaps the dying? And yet they demand that the duty shall be put upon opium too, because by releasing the duty it might be considered a step in the direction of "free-trade."

Well, what next? We have got cotton-ties on the free list. The duty collected on these is $121,000 annually. Nearly all these cotton-ties are made in foreign countries, as I am informed. They can not be made as cheaply here as in other countries and brought here with 35 per cent. duty. That was the rate prior to the tariff of 1883. That rate was retained in the tariff of 1883. There was some gentleman on the other side who said cotton-ties could not be made at 35 per cent., and proposed to increase the duty in order to keep out cotton-ties and give our manufacturers the right to make them; but Mr. Morrill, the great living father of protection, refused to disturb the duty of 35 per cent. on cotton-ties. The consequence is that it is a mere revenue duty, and the revenues are not needed, but they still continue to come, and the surplus revenues continues to increase. The result is that we get $121,000, not needed in the present condition or the Treasury, and we propose to help to relieve this condition by removing the duty to the extent of $121,000 on cotton-ties. Yet, because we do that, we are called sectional.

My friends out through the Northwest, have you ever realized the fact that to a very large extent your prosperity is dependent upon the prosperity of the Southern planter? Have you ever thought that it might be well to enable these poor people to buy more horses and more mules and more hogs and more of your bacon and lard and flour? For years and years you have been sending these things to us as the chief consumers of your great products, and we have been enabled to purchase them from you by the profits we make on the production of cotton. But just in proportion as you overtax your customers to that extent do you cripple their capacity to buy; for just in proportion as their capacity to buy is crippled, your capacity to sell is crippled.

We have bristles, $174,000. These we put on the free list to help manufacturers make brushes and give more employment to our people and give them better wages. These bristles, I am told, though I do not know whether it is true or not, come chiefly from Russia. They have a certain quality of stiffness which makes them superior to other kinds and better than any that can be produced here. As I say, we have put them on the free list. Does that injure any industry? Who is hurt by such an arrangement? Not one. And yet our friends on the other side turn up their eyes in horror and say, here is another evidence of free-trade that we are forcing upon the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And then we come to the article of currants, Zante, or other kind. These do not grow in this country, either. They come from but one spot on the whole globe. My friend over there [Mr. COX] knows where they come from. He has been on this little island in the Gulf of Corinth. It has a peculiar climate and soil solely adapted to produce them, and with temperature and other conditions that make it possible to produce them. There alone are they produced, and they are brought to this country and placed upon our market. We propose to put them on the free list. It does not disturb a single laborer employed in the production of currants in this country; not one. None of them are grown here; none can be produced here, and yet our friends on the other side cry out again, "Another evidence of free-trade." You must tax the people in their food; you must tax the people in their clothing; you must tax them in their implements of labor, and if you want anything free, take a free drink of whisky. [Great laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Here is lumber. We have put it on the free list to shelter the people in the Northwest from the terrible and rigorous climate of that region. We Democrats say to our poor people it is time for you to be considered. Prior Congresses have released the taxes on banks, the tax on domestic manufactures, the taxes on railroads, the taxes on telegraph companies, the taxes on express companies, and the taxes for buying and selling exchanges. All the wealth of the country has been released, now the Democratic party is again doing business at the old stand and says we intend to hunt the men who are living in sod houses and give them free lumber. [Applause.]

Well, we found ostrich feathers with a tax of $25.07. There are no ostriches in this country. This is not yet an infant industry in the United States. Ostriches are not found on the western prairies, nor in the northern woods, nor along the Gulf coast, but our ladies want to wear the ostrich feathers sometimes in their bonnets, and we do not need the money, and why should we not let them come in free?

When we again inaugurate Grover Cleveland on the 4th of March next we will want all the ostrich feathers to adorn the hats and bonnets of our ladies as they join in the procession and keep up with the band-wagon. [Applause.]

I have been told, Mr. Speaker, and I see evidences of it, that my poor scalp is marked as a trophy to adorn the belts of those who "receive the sole benefits of the tariff;" that my head, too, is doomed to the basket. In my district the enemies of the Democratic party and the friends of this combination are mustering their clans for a tremendous effort, and they say that they intend to vacate the seat I have held so long. I see from the public prints that money is being poured into the district I represent, and all the elements of opposition are organizing and mustering for the fray; but I want to say to them here, once for all, that the people of the Ninth Congressional district of Texas are not for sale. [Great applause on the Democratic side.]

I have political enemies in my district; there are men there who have given me many hard blows in former contests, which I have returned in kind. They will vote against me; they will do their best to defeat my return to the Fifty-first Congress. Their opposition comes from principle. But all the tortures of the Inquisition could not induce them to exchange their manhood for money, and all the money that can be extorted from the combination could not buy one of their votes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude I want to refer to the celebrated suit of clothes which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] exhibited to the House during the delivery of his speech on the 17th of May. In the speech which I made in the opening of this debate I said if a laborer who was earning $1 a day finds a suit of clothes which he could buy for $10 without the tariff tax, the suit could be procured by ten days' work, but if Congress at the instance of the manufacturer puts a duty of 100 per cent. on the clothes, he would be required to work twenty days to get the same suit. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY], when he came to answer me, produced a suit of clothes which he said was identical with the suit of which I spoke, and which he said could be bought in the city of Boston, Philadelphia, New York, Chicago, and Pittsburgh for $10.

I have been at great pains to trace that very suit, and have followed it back to the manufacturer and procured all the items of its cost. I have got its exact cost and its exact weight. Its total cost was $6.68. Its labor cost was $1.65. Its weight was 4 pounds and 4 ounces. It required, so say the wool manufacturers, 4 pounds of wool in the grease to make 1 pound of wool cloth, then it required 17 pounds of greasy wool to make the 4 pounds and 4 ounces of goods. The duty on that wool is 10 cents a pound, or $1.70 for the suit. Therefore the cost of that suit "without the tariff tax" was $4.98. Instead of that being a $10 suit of clothes "without the tariff tax," it was a $4.98 suit. Now for the protection of that suit that cost, with the wool duty added, $6.68, there is a tariff tax of 40 cents per pound for compensating the manufacturer for the duty he advanced on the wool that amounts to $1.70; then there is a tax of 35 per cent. for his own protection which amounts to $2.33, the whole protection amounting to $4.03, which added to the $6.68 makes $10.71. Of course the manufacturer had to undersell the foreign suit, and to do so dropped under him 71 cents, and sold his $4.98 suit for $10 with the help of the tariff.

These are the facts about your suit of clothes. I am told that suit of clothes is to be photographed and sent out as a campaign document. All I ask is that the fact be photographed on the brain of every voter that the actual cost of that $10 suit of clothes was less than $5; and that the tariff made it cost $10 worth of labor to purchase it; and but for the tariff it would have cost only $5. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My friend from Ohio, when referring to that subject, said it was "the old, old story" that he had read in Adam Smith. This reminds me of the incident in regard to the boy who had stolen his brother's marbles. The little fellow who had been wronged went to his mother in tears and said, "Brother has stolen all my marbles." The mother, addressing the culprit, said, "My son, don't you know you have done wrong? Don't you know the Lord will be angry with you for taking your brother's property without his consent? You found him asleep and you rifled his pockets. Are you not ashamed of yourself? Don't you know you have done very wrong? Don't the Bible say, 'Thou shalt not steal'?" "Yes, mother," the boy replied, "that is the old, old story; Moses said that 4,000 years ago." [Laughter.]

Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is the old, old story. The story of wrong and oppression. The story of the strong spoiling the weak. It is the old story that has come down to us through all the ages. We are commanded not to steal nor to take our brother's goods by wrong, but to do unto him as we would have him do unto us. We stand here to-day in the eyes of the American people, and in their name, and demand that the Government shall stop taking their property and giving it to others; shall stop taking their money not needed for the support of the Government. From every part of the country they are calling upon us for justice. They are appealing to us for protection in its better and higher sense. They are appealing to us to take the hand of the robbers out of their pockets and let them have the benefits of their own labor and enjoy the rewards of their own toil; and, Mr. Speaker, we intend to do it. [Loud and prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

The average rate of duty on dutiable goods under existing law was, on importations of 1887, 47.10 per cent.; under proposed bill the average rate of duty on dutiable goods, based on same importations, would be 42.49 per cent.

NOTE.—Schedules F (tobacco), H (liquors), and I (silk goods) are not affected by the bill.

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., July, 1888.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate under the rule has expired.

Mr. MILLS. I demand the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any of the amendments?

Mr. McKINLEY. I demand a separate vote, and a yea-and-nay vote on the cotton-tie amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I would state to my friend from Ohio that a separate vote on the cotton-tie amendment, if carried, would simply have the effect of leaving the provision in the bill as reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. McKINLEY. I understand the condition. I demand a separate vote on that by yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further demand for a separate vote, the question will be taken in gross upon the remainder of the amendments.

The remaining amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment on which a separate vote is demanded by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 120, after the word "baling," insert "and other;" so that the clause as amended will read:

"Iron and steel cotton-ties or hoops for baling or other purposes, not thinner than number 20 wire gauge."

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. Let the amendment be clearly stated, Mr. Speaker, so that the House may understand the question.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. KELLEY. May I ask the precise form of the vote, so that there may be no mistake on this question?

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union amended the item in relation to cotton-ties by inserting the words "or other purposes" after the words "for baling," used in the bill reported from the committee; and this vote is being taken upon agreeing to that amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Do I understand that hoop-iron for other purposes than cotton-ties was placed upon the free-list?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must construe the language for himself. The committee inserted the words in that connection "or other purposes." [Cries of "Question!"]

The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 170, nays 128, not voting 26; as follows:

So the amendment was adopted.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, said: I withdraw my vote.

Mr. WILBER. I desire to change my vote from "ay" to "no."

Mr. KERR. I change my vote from "no" to "ay." [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. HOGG with Mr. RANDALL, on the tariff bill. If present, Mr. HOGG would vote for the bill and Mr. RANDALL against it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WHITING, of Michigan, with Mr. HIESTAND, until further notice. If present, Mr. WHITING would vote for and Mr. HIESTAND against the pending bill.

The following were announced as being paired on all questions until further notice:

Mr. BELMONT with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. PERRY with Mr. SPOONER.

Mr. GLOVER with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. HOUK.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLS. I now demand the previous question——

The SPEAKER. The previous question is still operating up to the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MILLS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is now, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Speaker, my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is absent from the House by reason of severe illness. He sent me the letter which I hold in my hand, with the request that I have it read at this time. I therefore ask the unanimous consent of the House to have it read before the roll-call is begun, and for that purpose I send it to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1888.

MY DEAR SIR: If a vote on Mr. MILLS's tariff bill is to be taken on Saturday, the 21st instant, I fear my strength, by reason of recent illness, will not permit my presence in the House on that day; and, if absent, I want you to secure me a pair with some one who favors that bill, as I would, if present, record my vote in opposition to it. Give this immediate care, as I do not wish to be misunderstood. I want it announced and distinctly known that I am opposed to the passage of the bill in question.

Yours, truly,

SAM. J. RANDALL.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SOWDEN,
House of Representatives.

[Great applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 162, nays 149, not voting 14; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

When the names of Mr. ANDERSON of Iowa, Mr. BROWER, Mr. FITCH, Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia, Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin, and Mr. NELSON were called and they voted in favor of the bill, there was applause on the Democratic side.

When the names of Mr. BLISS, Mr. GREENMAN, Mr. MERRIMAN, and Mr. SOWDEN were called and they voted against the bill, there was applause on the Republican side.

When the roll-call was concluded, the Speaker directed his name to be called, and he voted in the affirmative. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

After the recapitulation of the vote the following additional pair was announced:

Mr. GRANGER with Mr. WOODBURN, on all political questions and on the tariff bill. If present, Mr. GRANGER would vote for the bill and Mr. WOODBURN would vote against the bill.

Mr. CHEADLE. My colleague, Mr. THOMAS M. BROWNE, is absent, by reason of sickness, at Capon Springs, W. Va. If he were present he would vote "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS moved the previous question on the adoption of the title of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and the title was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the title of the bill was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FILING OF REPORTS.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make from committees be allowed to deliver them to the Clerk for reference to appropriate Calendars.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

LIFE-SAVING STATION.

Mr. TARSNEY, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with Senate amendments the bill (H. R. 1923) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station at the harbor of Kewaunee, Wisconsin, and at other places therein named, in which non-concurrence was recommended; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RIVER RAILROAD.

Mr. COMPTON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1051) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GEORGETOWN BARGE, DOCK, ELEVATOR AND RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. COMPTON also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with amendment the bill (S. 2252) to incorporate the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator and Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH FRANCIS.

Mr. STAHLNECKER, from the Committee on the Library, reported back favorably the joint resolution (S. R. 62) in recognition of the services of Joseph Francis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

GENERAL JOSEPH WARREN.

Mr. STAHLNECKER also, from the Committee on the Library, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2392) for the erection of a monument to the memory of General Joseph Warren, who fell at the battle of Bunker Hill; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ELIJAH POTTS.

Mr. PIDCOCK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 8522) restoring the name of Elijah Potts to the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM FAIRBANKS.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10103) granting a pension to William Fairbanks; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. H. TIBBITS.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3830) for the relief of W H. Tibbits; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DANIEL J. OCKERSON.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 9794) for the relief of Daniel J. Ockerson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. HARRIET N. CAMPBELL.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3141) for the relief of Mrs. Harriet N. Campbell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SIMON T. IRWIN.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 10300) for the relief of Simon T. Irwin; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

M. F. VANCE.

Mr. McCREARY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2009) to restore the homestead right to M. F. Vance, of Akron, Colo.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JESSE A. CORN.

Mr. McCREARY also, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 2316) restoring the right of preemption to Jesse A. Corn; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TILL WEDNESDAY.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Wednesday next. I make that motion in compliance with the request of a number of the members on both sides of the House.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to make from committees be allowed to hand them to the Clerk. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BOUTELLE. As this is the twenty-seventh anniversary of the first battle of Bull Run, I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening. [Applause on the Republican side of the House.]

Mr. ROGERS. This is a Waterloo.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent that Monday and Tuesday be set aside for the consideration of legislation reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

Several MEMBERS. Yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 205, not voting 40; as follows:

Mr. McCOMAS with Mr. HOGG, until Friday next.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

A MEMBER. Mr. Speaker, what is the business assigned for the evening session?

The SPEAKER. This evening has been set apart for the consideration of bills of a general nature reported from the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims.

Mr. LAWLER. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will not press his motion.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. BLAND, and it was agreed to—ayes 105, noes 10.

The House accordingly (at 2 p. m.) took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m. The House was called to order by Mr. McMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the Clerk to read the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, D. C., July 21, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the session of the House this evening.

JNO. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the special order under which this evening session is held.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Saturday next the House take a recess from 5 until 8 o'clock, p. m., for the purpose of considering public measures reported by the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims; the said session to terminate not later than 10 p. m.

ADJUDICATION AND PAYMENT OF INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, if it be the pleasure of the House, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 8990) to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations, and move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the title of the bill, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read the bill by title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE]?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, before the House proceeds to the consideration of this bill I desire to say that it is the only one that I shall call up for consideration to-night, and if it meets the approbation of the House, I shall ask that the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims be discharged from the further consideration of various bills and petitions upon this subject which have been referred to it. I suppose the next thing in order is the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be considered by sections?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire to have the bill read, because I wish to make a motion that the amendments recommended by the committee may be acted upon as an entire proposition and disposed of by one vote.

The bill was read.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask that the amendments recommended by the committee be read.

The amendments were read.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, before asking further action on the bill I propose that the House now agree to the amendments reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded upon the amendments or any of them?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear a statement in explanation of this bill, because it is quite an important measure.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. After the amendments are acted upon so as to perfect the bill, I will either make a statement or the report can be read in explanation of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that we shall have the explanation before we are asked to act upon the amendments.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Then let the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8990) "to provide for the adjudication and payment of claims arising from Indian depredations," have duly considered the same, and report thereon as follows:

"That with certain amendments thereto, which are indicated in writing attached to the printed bill herewith submitted, the committee recommend the passage of the bill."

Early after the foundation of the Government, Congress, with a view to promote and secure tranquility and peace with the Indian tribes, and to discourage from private and personal revenge the citizens of the States and Territories who might suffer by the crimes and misdemeanors of the Indians, undertook, on behalf of the Government, to redress such crimes and misdemeanors, and to guaranty to such citizens indemnity for any loss of property. This wise and proper policy upon the part of Congress and the executive department has been adhered to, except only in partial indemnity to suffering citizens of the States and Territories in which the Indians reside. This adherence is shown in the acts of Congress from May 19, 1796, down to the present time, and as well also in treaties with various Indian tribes made by the executive department. (See Appendix A.)

In the promotion of this general policy the Government placed itself under similar obligations, by general laws and treaties, to the Indians against whom depredations may be committed. (See Appendix B; see Appendix C for reference to treaties.)

Under these laws and treaties a vast number of claims have arisen. These claimants have appealed for years to the Government to redeem its solemnly plighted faith for indemnity and compensation for their losses.

Prior to 1859, through the agency of the War and Interior Departments, a few citizens were paid and compensated. In the year 1859, by act of Congress, February 28, the pledge of indemnification out of the Treasury of the United States, as then existing, was repealed, but the obligation to pay for depredations out of annuities due to tribes, members of which had committed the same, was continued; yet, by joint resolution of Congress of date June 25, 1860, it was declared that the act of Congress referred to "shall not be construed to destroy or impair any right to indemnity which existed at the date of said repeal."

By all of the acts of Congress subsequent to that date the Government either directly or impliedly assumes the responsibility of indemnification to its citizens who "in its peace," and in the lawful pursuit of his or their business, incur losses of property from depredations committed by Indians.

But since 1859 the Government has (and even when the citizen is invited by its legislation to file his claim with one of the Departments for examination) inhibited payment "on account of said claims" unless a "specific appropriation therefor by Congress" has been made.

In the later acts of Congress special provision has been made for the examination of this class of claims by the Interior Department, and report thereof and thereon required to be made to Congress. From time to time these reports have been made, but action on said reports has been slow; indeed, so slow and limited as practically to deny these claimants the justice of payment to which they are entitled. And yet it is due to this Congress and its immediate predecessors to say that the delay is not occasioned by any want of sympathy for the claimants or any denial of the merits of their claims.

The change of policy in the mode of payment made in 1859, and continued since, has resulted in the accumulation in the Interior Department of a large number of claims, estimated as high as——in number, aggregating in amount about $15,000,000.

By this policy it is evident that a final judicial examination of these claims is devolved upon Congress. Hence is witnessed an amount of work thrown upon that body that a conscientious discharge of the labor so imposed would absorb not only the constant attention of any committee, but of the body of Congress, and to the exclusion of all other business, if pursued as the interests and merits of the claimants would seem to require.

This examination and allowance of claims by Congress is and will be necessarily embarrassed by the fact that in adjusting and providing payment from annuities due to various tribes of Indians for depredations committed by members thereof Congress should know not only the amount of the fund drawn on, but in making a present draft should further know the amount existing and likely to follow of the same character.

Another result of postponed action in consequence of this change of policy in payment since 1859 is the unquestioned fact that, with the exception of two or three tribes, the payment of admittedly meritorious claims would exhaust the annuity funds, due and to become due to the Indians, for years. The exaction of payment under this state of facts would involve possibly the domestic peace and security of a large part of the country; if not, it would devolve the duty and burden of their support upon the Government. In this aspect of the question the committee invoke the attention of the House and the country to the views and opinions of the honorable Secretary of the Interior as expressed in a letter addressed to this committee. (See Appendix C.)

Fully appreciating the justice of the demands of the claimants, now before Congress and the Departments of the Government, for depredations committed by Indians, and recognizing the moral and legal responsibility of the United States for their indemnification and payment, and being satisfied that a proper and speedy adjustment of the amounts due each party, as well as the determination of relevant and important adjunct questions, can not be had, at least for years, under existing modes of considering them, this committee has reached the conclusion that justice to the claimants, justice to Congress, and justice to the Government concur in demanding that a tribunal distinct and judicial in character, whose decisions, deliberately and judicially had, would command the respect and confidence alike of Congress and of the country, should be organized and charged with this duty, and hence the committee have carefully prepared and do recommend this bill, amended as proposed, to the favorable consideration of the House.

The committee in framing this bill have sought to be as liberal in securing for this class of claimants a speedy hearing and adjudication of their claims as in their opinion was possible, in view of all the embarrassments by which their consideration is environed.

To no class of its citizens is the American Government more indebted than to the heroic men and women who, as pioneers of our civilization, abandoning homes of comfort and ease, risked life and property to secure homes, wealth, and progress as the heritage of those who should follow in their pathway. A cheerful compensation for their losses, so incurred under the guaranty of the Government, is the deserved reward of their sacrifices.

APPENDIX A.

GENERAL LEGISLATION ON CLAIMS FOR DEPREDATIONS COMMITTED BY INDIANS.

I.—Act of May 19, 1796, sec. 14 (1 Stat. L., 742).

And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States, shall come over or across the said boundary line into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property, belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, or shall commit any murder, violence, or outrage, upon any such citizen or inhabitant, it shall be the duty of such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, to make application to the superintendent, or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize for that purpose, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction or instruction of the President of the United States, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction, and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction, in a reasonable time, not exceeding eighteen months, then it shall be the duty of such superintendent, or other person authorized, as aforesaid, to make return of his doings to the President of the United States, and forward to him all the documents and proofs in the case, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury. And, in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guaranty to the party injured an eventual indemnification: Provided always, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall in any way violate any of the provisions of this act by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge by crossing over the line on any of the Indian lands, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That nothing here contained shall prevent the legal apprehension or arresting within the limits of any State or district of any Indian having so offended: And provided further, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to deduct such sum or sums as shall be paid for the property taken, stolen, or destroyed by any such Indian out of the annual stipend which the United States are bound to pay to the tribe to which such Indian shall belong.

II.—Act of March 3, 1799, sec. 14 (1 Stat. L., 747).

And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States, shall come over or cross the said boundary line, into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, or horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, or shall commit any murder, violence, or outrage upon any such citizen or inhabitant, it shall be the duty of such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, to make application to the superintendent, or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize for that purpose; who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction or instruction of the President of the United States, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction, and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction, in reasonable time, not exceeding eighteen months, then it shall be the duty of such superintendent or other person authorized as aforesaid, to make return of his doings to the President of the United States, and forward to him all the documents and proofs in the case, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guaranty to the party injured an eventual indemnification: Provided always, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall, in any way, violate any of the provisions of this act by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge by crossing over the line on any of the Indian lands, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension or arresting, within the limits of any State or district, of any Indian having so offended: And provided further, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to deduct such sum or sums as shall be paid for the property taken, stolen, or destroyed by any such Indian out of the annual stipend which the United States are bound to pay to the tribe to which such Indian shall belong.

And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians, belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States, shall come over or cross the said boundary line into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the Territorial districts of the United States, or shall commit any murder, violence, or outrage upon any such citizen or inhabitant, it shall be the duty of such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent to make application to the superintendent, or such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize for that purpose, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction or instruction of the President of the United States, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction, and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, then it shall be the duty of such superintendent or other person, authorized as aforesaid, to make return of his doings to the President of the United States, and forward to him all the documents and proofs in the case, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guaranty to the party injured an eventual indemnification: Provided always, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall, in any way, violate any of the provisions of this act, by seeking, or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, by crossing over the line, on any of the Indian lands, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided, also, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension or arresting, within the limits of any State or district, of any Indian having so offended: And further provided, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to deduct such sum or sums as shall be paid for the property taken, stolen, or destroyed by such Indian out of the annual stipend which the United States are bound to pay to the tribe to which such Indian shall belong.

IV.—Act of June 30, 1834, sec. 17 (4 Stat. L., 731).

And be it further enacted, That if any Indian or Indians belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States shall, within the Indian country, take or destroy the property of any person lawfully within such country, or shall pass from the Indian country into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse, horses, or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, may make application to the proper superintendent, agent, or sub-agent, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction of the President, make application to the nation or tribe to which said Indian or Indians shall belong for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, it shall be the duty of such superintendent, agent, or sub-agent to make return of his doings to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper, in the opinion of the President, to obtain satisfaction for the injury; and, in the mean time, in respect to the property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guaranty to the party so injured an eventual indemnification: Provided, That if such injured party, his representative, attorney, or agent, shall in any way violate any of the provisions of this act, by seeking or attempting to obtain private satisfaction or revenge, he shall forfeit all claim upon the United States for such indemnification: And provided also, That unless such claim shall be presented within three years after the commission of the injury, the same shall be barred. And if the nation or tribe to which such Indian may belong receive an annuity from the United States, such claim shall, at the next payment of the annuity, be deducted therefrom and paid to the party injured; and if no annuity is payable to such nation or tribe, then the amount of the claim shall be paid from the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the legal apprehension and punishment of any Indians having so offended.

V.—Act of February 28, 1859, sec. 8 (11 Stat. L., 401).

And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 13, 1834, as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases, by Indians trespassing on white men, as described in said act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair or destroy the obligation of the Indians to make indemnification out of the annuities as prescribed in said act.

VI.—Joint resolution of June 25, 1860 (12 Stat. L., 120).

That the repeal of [by] the eighth section of the act of Congress, approved the 28th day of February, 1859, of so much of the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," approved June 13, 1834, as provides that the United States shall make indemnification out of the Treasury for property taken or destroyed in certain cases by Indians trespassing on white men, as described in said act, shall not be construed to destroy or impair any right to indemnity which existed at the date of said repeal.

VII.—Act of July 15, 1870, sec. 4 (16 Stat. L., 360). Sec. 2098, Revised Statutes.

And be it further enacted, That no part of the moneys appropriated by this act, or which may hereafter be appropriated in any general act or deficiency bill making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, to pay annuities due to or to be used and expended for the care and benefit of any tribe or tribes of Indians named herein, shall be applied to the payment of any claim for depredations that may have been or may be committed by such tribe or tribes, or any member or members thereof; and no claims for Indian depredations shall hereafter be paid until Congress shall make special appropriation therefor; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

VIII.—Act of May 29, 1872, sec. 7 (17 Stat. L., 190). Secs. 445 and 466, Revised Statutes.

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to to prepare and cause to be published such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary or proper, prescribing the manner of presenting claims arising under existing laws or treaty stipulations, for compensation for depredations committed by the Indians, and the degree and character of the evidence necessary to support such claims; he shall carefully investigate all such claims as may be presented, subject to the rules and regulations prepared by him, and report to Congress, at each session thereof, the nature, character, and amount of such claims, whether allowed by him or not, and the evidence upon which his action was based: Provided, That no payment on account of said claims shall be made without a specific appropriation therefor by Congress.

IX.—Section 2156, Revised Statutes.

If any Indian belonging to any tribe in amity with the United States shall, within the Indian country, take or destroy the property of any person lawfully within such country, or shall pass from Indian country into any State or Territory inhabited by citizens of the United States, and there take, steal, or destroy any horse or other property belonging to any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, such citizen or inhabitant, his representative, attorney, or agent, may make application to the proper superintendent, agent, or sub-agent, who, upon being furnished with the necessary documents and proofs, shall, under the direction of the President, make application to the nation or tribe to which such Indian shall belong for satisfaction; and if such nation or tribe shall neglect or refuse to make satisfaction in a reasonable time, not exceeding twelve months, such superintendent, agent, or sub-agent shall make return of his doings to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that such further steps may be taken as shall be proper, in the opinion of the President, to obtain satisfaction for the injury.

X.—Act of March 3, 1885 (23 Stat. L., 376).

INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS.

For the investigation of certain Indian depredation claims, $10,000; and in expending said sum the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a complete list of all claims heretofore filed in the Interior Department and which have been approved in whole or in part and now remain unpaid, and also all such claims as are pending but not yet examined, on behalf of citizens of the United States, on account of depredations committed, chargeable against any tribe of Indians by reason of any treaty between such tribe and the United States, including the name and address of the claimants, the date of the alleged depredations, by what tribe committed, the date of examination and approval, with a reference to the date and clause of the treaty creating the obligation for payment, to be made and presented to Congress at its next regular session; and the Secretary is authorized and empowered, before making such report, to cause such additional investigation to be made and such further testimony to be taken as he may deem necessary to enable him to determine the kind and value of all property damaged or destroyed by reason of the depredation aforesaid, and by what tribe such depredations were committed; and his report shall include his determination upon each claim, together with the names and residences of witnesses and the testimony of each, and also what funds are now existing or to be derived by reason of treaty or other obligation out of which the same should be paid.

XI.—Act of May 15, 1886 (not yet published).

Indian depredation claims: For continuing the investigation and examination of certain Indian depredation claims, originally authorized, and in the manner therein provided for, by the Indian appropriation act approved March 3, 1885, $20,000; and the examination and report shall include claims, if any, barred by statute, such fact to be stated in the report; and all claims whose examination shall be completed by January 1, 1887, shall then be reported to Congress, with the opinions and conclusions of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior upon all material facts, and all the evidence and papers pertaining thereto.

APPENDIX B.

GENERAL LEGISLATION ON CLAIMS FOR DEPREDATIONS COMMITTED BY WHITES ON THE PROPERTY OF INDIANS.

I.—Act of May 19, 1796, sec. 4 (1 Stat. L., 470).

And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen, or other person, shall go into any town, settlement, or territory belonging, or secured by treaty with the United States, to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit robbery, larceny, trespass, or other crimes against the person or property of any friendly Indian or Indians which would be punishable, if committed within the jurisdiction of any State, against a citizen of the United States, or, unauthorized by law, and with a hostile intention, shall be found on any Indian land, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding $100, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months; and shall also, when property is taken or destroyed, forfeit and pay to such Indian or Indians to whom the property taken or destroyed belongs a sum equal to twice the just value of the property so taken or destroyed; and if such offender shall be unable to pay a sum at least equal to the said just value, whatever such payment shall fall short of the said just value shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States: Provided, nevertheless, That no such Indian shall be entitled to any payment out of the Treasury of the United States, for any such property taken or destroyed, if he, or any of the nation to which he belongs, shall have sought private revenge or attempted to obtain satisfaction by any force or violence.

II.—Act of March 3, 1799, sec. 4 (1 Stat. L., 744).

And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen or person shall go into any town, settlement, or territory belonging, or secured by treaty with the United States, to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit robbery, larceny, trespass, or other crime against the person or property of any friendly Indian or Indians, which would be punishable if committed within the jurisdiction of any State against a citizen of the United States, or, unauthorized by law, and with a hostile intention, shall be found on any Indian land, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding $100 and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months; and shall also, when property is taken or destroyed, forfeit and pay to such Indian or Indians, to whom the property taken and destroyed belongs, a sum equal to twice the just value of the property so taken or destroyed. And if such offender shall be unable to pay a sum equal at least to the said just value, whatever such payment shall fall short of the said just value shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States: Provided, nevertheless, That no such Indian shall be entitled to any payment out of the Treasury of the United States for any such property taken or destroyed, if he, or any of the nation to which he belongs, shall have sought private revenge or attempted to obtain satisfaction by any force or violence.

III.—Act of March 30, 1802, sec. 4 (2 Stat. L., 141).

And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen, or other person, shall go into any town, settlement, or territory belonging or secured by treaty with the United States to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit robbery, larceny, trespass, or other crime against the person or property of any friendly Indian or Indians, which would be punishable, if committed within the jurisdiction of any State against a citizen of the United States; or, unauthorized by law, and with a hostile intention, shall be found on any Indian land, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding $100, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months; and shall also, when property is taken or destroyed, forfeit and pay to such Indian or Indians to whom the property taken and destroyed belongs a sum equal to twice the just value of the property so taken or destroyed; and if such offender shall be unable to pay a sum at least equal to the said just value, whatever such payment shall fall short of the said just value shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States: Provided, nevertheless, That no such Indian shall be entitled to any payment out of the Treasury of the United States for such property taken or destroyed, if he, or any of the nation to which he belongs, shall have sought private revenge or attempted to obtain satisfaction by any force or violence.

IV.—Act of June 30, 1834, sec. 16 (4 Stat. L., 731).

And be it further enacted, That where, in the commission, by a white person, of any crime, offense, or misdemeanor, within the Indian country, the property of any friendly Indian is taken, injured, or destroyed, and a conviction is had for such crime, offense, or misdemeanor, the person so convicted shall be sentenced to pay to such friendly Indian to whom the property may belong, or whose person may be injured, a sum equal to twice the just value of the property so taken, injured, or destroyed. And if such offender shall be unable to pay a sum at least equal to the just value or amount, whatever such payment shall fall short of the same shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That no such Indian shall be entitled to any payment, out of the Treasury of the United States, for any such property, if he, or any of the nation to which he belongs, shall have sought private revenge or attempted to obtain satisfaction by any force or violence: And provided also, That if such offender can not be apprehended and brought to trial, the amount of such property shall be paid out of the Treasury as aforesaid.

V.—Sections 2154 and 2155, Revised Statutes.

Whenever, in the commission, by a white person, of any crime, offense, or misdemeanor within the Indian country, the property of any friendly Indian is taken, injured, or destroyed, and a conviction is had for such crime, offense, or misdemeanor, the person so convicted shall be sentenced to pay to such friendly Indian to whom the property may belong, or whose person may be injured, a sum equal to twice the just value of the property so taken, injured, or destroyed.

If such offender shall be unable to pay a sum at least equal to the just value or amount, whatever such payment shall fall short of the same shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. If such offender can not be apprehended and brought to trial, the amount of such property shall be paid out of the Treasury. But no Indian shall be entitled to any payment out of the Treasury of the United States for any such property if he, or any of the nation to which he belongs, have sought private revenge, or have attempted to obtain satisfaction by any force or violence.

APPENDIX C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, March 24, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of 16th instant, inclosing, with request for the views and opinion of the Department thereon, the following resolution adopted by the Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims, House of Representatives:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to give his views as to the wisdom and policy of providing in bills which may be passed by Congress for the relief of individual claimants, or in bills of a general character for claims on account of depredations committed by Indians, that payment may be made out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, without regard to the fact that, under treaty obligations, some of said claims may be paid from annuity funds.

"And further, That the Secretary be requested to inform this committee as to the status of the annuity funds belonging to, or which may under existing laws belong to, any tribe or tribes of Indians; which funds may be held subject to claims on the part of citizens of the United States for depredations committed."

In response thereto I transmit herewith a copy of a report, dated 22d instant, from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, wherein he states "that the annuity funds of all of the Indian tribes, except the five civilized tribes and the Osages, are such that if taken from them for the payment of any claim, however just, would subject them to conditions of such dependency and want as would tend to drive them to acts of hostility and crime, and thereby necessitate additional appropriations for their support."

The Commissioner gives a tabulated statement showing the liabilities of the United States to Indian tribes under treaty stipulations, taken from his annual report for 1887.

The non-payment of the claims of citizens of the United States for depredations committed by Indians can not, to any very large extent, be chargeable to neglect on the part of the claimants in presenting their claims for adjudication. Many of these claims have been reported by this Department from time to time to Congress for allowance, for which no provision or authority of law for their payment has been made. The use of small sums from time to time from the annuities of Indians for the payment of just claims for depredations committed by the tribe or members thereof would not have wrought such hardships and embarrassment as will result from absorbing the whole or the larger portion of their annuities as they may hereafter be appropriated in the payment of the accumulated amounts of such claims charged against them. The disappearance of game and the attention and efforts that the Indians are now giving to industrial pursuits have increased their necessities for the use for their benefit of the funds payable to them under existing treaties and laws. The progress of their civilization would be interrupted by the diversion of their funds wholly or to any very large extent for the payment of such claims at this time.

The delay in making final adjudication of such claims has been a severe hardship upon such of the claimants whose claims are just and who were entitled to be protected by the Government from the depredation upon their property by Indians.

I do not think that there should be any further unnecessary delay in the payment of such sums as have been and shall hereafter be ascertained to be justly due on such claims. If the Indians have no funds or annuities, or, if they have such funds which will not, all things considered, bear the draft of such payments as may be justly charged against them, I think the payments should be made out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and an account be kept of such payments under the head of the tribes or bands committing the depredations, to the end that such payments may be charged up against any funds that may hereafter accrue to them as proceeds of sales of any surplus lands within their reservation which may be disposed of for them under the general allotment act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat., 388), or otherwise.

Very respectfully,

WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

THE CHAIRMAN SELECT COMMITTEE ON INDIAN DEPREDATION CLAIMS,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1888.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your reference, the inclosed letter and resolution of House Select Committee on Indian Depredation Claims, and in reply thereto would respectfully submit the following report:

First. That the annuity funds of all the Indian tribes, except the five civilized tribes and the Osages, are such that if taken from them for the payment of any claim, however just, would subject them to conditions of such dependency and want as would tend to drive them to acts of hostility and crime, and thereby necessitate additional appropriations for their support.

Second. For further answer to said resolution, I herewith inclose a tabulated statement taken from my annual report for the year 1887, pages 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, and 298, showing the liabilities of the United States to Indian tribes under treaty stipulations.

Very respectfully,

J. D. C. ATKINS, Commissioner.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BLAND. Before the gentleman proceeds I would like to ask him how these claims are to be paid after they are adjudicated. Are they to be certified to Congress?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. They are to be paid by appropriation.

Mr. BLAND. I did not notice any provision in the bill requiring them to be certified to Congress.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, in explaining the details of this bill I desire to be as brief and at the same time as explicit as possible.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like to know, as others would, the class of claims to which this bill applies, their scope, just how they arise, etc.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, under various acts of Congress commencing almost with the history of the Government, the first act having been passed in 1796, the Government of the United States, intending to secure peace and tranquillity to its citizens upon the borders, said to them: "Observe all your obligations to the Indians; preserve peaceable relations with them; proceed lawfully with your business, and if any destruction of property should occur, we, desiring that you refrain from any attempt at private revenge or any personal effort to recover compensation from the Indians, undertake to guaranty you indemnification." The language of the law, as first passed, was this:

And in the mean time, in respect to property so taken, stolen, or destroyed, the United States guaranty to the party injured eventual indemnification.

This policy enunciated in 1796 was reaffirmed in the act of 1834 and continued to be the declared policy of the Government by its enactments down to 1859, when, Mr. Speaker, the policy of the Government was changed—not in reference to its duty to the citizen, but in this respect: At and prior to that period the Government of the United States was and had been making treaties with the Indians by which indemnification or payment for property stolen or destroyed was provided to be made out of funds promised to be paid by the United States to the Indians as annuities or treaty funds. In 1859 the Government of the United States in legal effect said to its citizens, "Observe the law, follow your lawful avocations peaceably; and we undertake to declare that, having in our hands as trustee money due to these Indians, we will undertake your indemnification and payment out of said funds."

The Government of the United States from that time to the present has failed to make payment to various citizens of the United States whose property has been destroyed or carried away by Indian depredations. The Government having in its possession as trustee funds which legally and morally, as any court would say, ought to have been paid over promptly to the parties injured, has applied these funds to meet the needs of the Indians, and in supplying their wants and necessities has, I submit, so far as it could be done, preserved the peace and tranquillity of the country, but in doing so has become and is, omitting every other view, liable to the honest claimants.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I find in the bill this language:

Provided, That in determining the liability of the United States to pay these claims or any part thereof the question of limitation as to time and manner of presenting them as prescribed by statutes shall be waived by the court.

Now, does my friend say that this act shall cover all claims from the beginning, from the passage of the act of 1796, of which he speaks, until the present time?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The claims up to the year 1834, it is believed, have been paid. There is no liability beyond 1834; very little beyond the year 18 9. But the citizens of the United States have never been provided with a suitable tribunal in which to file their claims. This is a matter of simple justice to these poor claimants distant from the seat of Government, many of whose claims are now on file informally; yet if the plea of the statute of limitations should be made it is feared a number of honest, just claims might be excluded. Some of these parties injured have filed their claims with the Indian agent, to whom at first under the law complaint was required to be made. Hence many parties who have made their complaints with the Indian agent have ignorantly supposed that this was a formal filing of the claim.

Now, it was the opinion of the committee that these parties in coming before a court should not be held by any technical rule——

Mr. PETERS. There is one case in which the claim was never filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or even with the Indian agent; but the party had a bill presented to Congress, which was passed by this House in the Forty-third or Forty-fourth Congress, but never passed the Senate.

Mr. BLOUNT. Some of these claims have been rejected by the Interior Department, some of them have come to this House and been rejected here. I suppose under the terms of this bill all those cases will come in.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. This bill removes the bar absolutely, as I understand. I may be wrong.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The intention of the committee was to place these parties, who have, in one way or another, appealed to the Government, appealed to its agents, in some shape that they shall through some tribunal have a hearing of their just claims. They can not, and I regret to say it—I regret that the history of your proceedings in Congress shows it—they can not or have not been able at least to obtain justice from Congress, the last tribunal to which an appeal could be made. And in saying that in behalf of the committee I do not wish to reflect upon Congress. I have data, and in proper shape will apply it, for I had occasion to turn recently to the remarks of our distinguished Speaker at the close of the Forty-eighth Congress, when he alluded to the fact that during that Congress about ten thousand bills and joint resolutions had been presented, and he called the attention of the country to the fact that owing to the number of private claims and demands being made, it was impossible, in the very nature and order of things, that these claims could be heard in Congress. And he spoke, and voicing the honest sentiment of the House, and the honest sentiment of the country, when responsive to the demands of individuals for justice, of the necessity for the appointment of tribunals that ought to be provided by law for the hearing and adjudication of these claims. I submit the following extracts of the Speaker's remarks as pertinent to this proposed legislation:

In the first Congress the House of Representatives consisted of only sixty-seven members, less than the present membership of the Senate. Now there are three hundred and twenty-five, besides the delegates from the Territories. From the organization of the Government to the close of the Twenty-fifth Congress, a period of fifty years, there were introduced into the House, as shown by its records, 8,777 bills and joint resolutions, while during the two sessions of the present Congress 8,630 bills and joint resolutions have been introduced—almost as many as during that half century.

[Extract. Forty-eighth Congress, second session, pages 2572-3.]

It is evident that unless some constitutional or legislative provision can be adopted which will relieve Congress from the consideration of all, or at least a large part, of the local and private measures which now occupy the time of the committees and fill the Calendars of the two Houses, the percentage of business left undisposed of at each adjournment must continue to increase from year to year. It is not reasonable to suppose that an alteration of the Constitution can be effected, but it is worthy of serious consideration, whether a general law might not be enacted which would authorize the several Executive Departments and the courts of justice to hear and determine these matters under such rules and regulations as would amply protect the interests of the Government, and at the same time secure to the citizen a more expeditious and appropriate remedy than is now afforded. If this shall be done time and opportunity will be afforded here for the deliberate consideration of those great public questions which the Constitution has committed to the legislative department, and something might be done to promote the welfare of the whole people without neglecting the special interests of any.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman permit me just there?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Before answering the gentleman from Georgia, let me say that I have further turned during this session to the proceedings, and I find that up to this date nearly fifteen thousand bills and joint resolutions have been presented to the Fiftieth Congress. I exhibit here an official statement, prepared in the Clerk's office, showing the exact number:

[First session Fiftieth Congress, July 19, 1888.]

House bills introduced	10,896
House joint resolutions introduced	201
		11,097
Senate bills introduced	3,356
Senate joint resolutions introduced	99
		3,455
Total both Houses		14,552

The great body of these represent private claims. The percentage of increase since the close of the Forty-eighth Congress shows the wisdom of Mr. Speaker CARLISLE'S suggestions.

The allowance of ten hours' daily work in the consideration of each of these bills and joint resolutions would require several years' constant and uninterrupted labor.

I speak the voice of the committee when I say that when we came to the consideration of these claims, on looking over the field we knew that in justice to ourselves, in justice to the House, in justice to these claimants and to the Government, we could not possibly devote that time to the examination that their merits and a stern sense of duty and justice demanded. It was utterly impossible.

Mr. HERMANN. Let me say to the gentleman right there that the clerk of our committee has tabulated the claims recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and shows that over six thousand claims have been certified.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Not certified, but that is the number of claims existing on file.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know whether the gentleman can state the amount covered by these claims in dollars?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The amount is mentioned in the report at $15,000,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is my friend sure that that is what they will amount to, or does he state only what appears of record? Does my friend undertake to speak of claims outside of the record?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I do not suppose that outside of that there will be many, because since 1885, when Congress provided for the filing of these claims in the Interior Department, during that year and 1886 and 1887, and up to the present time, they have been filed. I think practically they are all in.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is most likely that the claim agents will find a good many more when this bill gets through.

Mr. RYAN. I think not; I think the great bulk of these claims has been presented.

Mr. SYMES. I am confident that there are but a few more of them.

Mr. DUNN. That is the impression of all who have examined the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Permit me to say, I do not believe there will be that when the whole question is opened and the liabilities ascertained, over three or four million dollars found justly due to claimants of all classes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish my friend from Tennessee to state—not that I am hostile to this measure——

Mr. BLOUNT. Who has the floor?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio for a suggestion.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I wish to see if I have a correct apprehension of this measure. The question of amount, whatever it may be, if justly due, ought to cut no figure——

Mr. HEARD. That is exactly my view.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. For I would rather see an empty Treasury with honor to the Government than an overflowing Treasury with the Government claims dishonored by a disregard of its just obligations.

Now, this Government, from the foundation of it up to the present time, has been paying certain Indians——

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Not from the foundation of the Government.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Well, for a great many years, I understand, by treaties and by statutes, we have held these Indians liable for depredations committed by any member of the tribe upon the property of other Indians or upon the property of white men.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And have agreed to indemnify them for trespasses committed by the white people.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. That is correct. Ita lex scripta.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Exactly. Now, during that time no tribunal has been organized for the purpose of adjudicating these claims, and they have been acted upon, as far as any action has been taken, in this House. Hence they are referred here, and the result is that they are not permitted to have such examination as ought to be made of them.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is impossible to examine them.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understand the purpose of this bill is to establish a tribunal which shall take up—first removing the bar of the statute of limitations—take up the cases in their order, and endeavor to determine how much shall be paid to the whites for depredations committed by the Indians, and how much is due to the Indian tribes for trespasses committed by the whites, and that the findings of the court upon the evidence so taken shall be reported to Congress for its action.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. No. Let me interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. A moment. I see I was in error there, and that their adjudication shall be final. If the judgments they may find, for I may call them judgments, are against the tribes, then the payment may be taken out of their indemnity funds.

Mr. SYMES. Not necessarily.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then how would it be paid?

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Pardon me a moment. I have my mind running on this just now, and will state that when these findings of the court are submitted to the Department, as provided in the bill, the Secretary of the Interior shall annually transmit to Congress a list of such findings, and report what trust or other funds of the Indians are available for the liquidation of any claims found justly due by them.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I understood that the bar of the statute of limitations, if I may describe it in that way, is to be removed——

Mr. WHITTHORNE. There is no statute of limitations.

Mr. LAIRD. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] allow me to make a partial answer to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. And then, when the judgment is rendered and when the finding is made, that out of the annuity, out of this trust fund, to which my friend called attention, these claims are to be paid. Now, the only objection that occurred to me is this: In the first place, there is some question as to not having the statute of limitations removed; and in the next place there may be some objection to having the court to sit in Washington to settle these claims; and if we pay these claims out of the annuity, we may absolutely deprive the Indians of what is due to them for their maintenance.

Mr. SYMES. This does not provide for paying them out the annuities.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. There is no statute of limitation upon this indemnity; that is more a term than anything else.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then has my friend any objection to it going out?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Now, under the law as it is, certain Indian tribes are protected from depredations committed by whites, the Government being responsible to the Indian tribes. The white man is also indemnified for depredations committed by the Indians. Now, the fact that the indemnification has not been made is not the fault of the claimants, because they have appealed to every tribunal they could. When the matter was under the control of the War Department they appealed to the Secretary of War, and then when it was brought under the Interior Department they appealed to the officers thereof, and then to Congress. They have made every appeal. It has been no fault of theirs; it has been no fault of individual members of Congress, but it is a fault which arises from the want of time on the part of Congress and the officers of the Government to determine these claims. Now, this indemnification is by the Government out of its funds, and since the act of 1859 out of moneys due to Indians.

Mr. SYMES. If you read the report it states the fact about it. You will see it does not remove at all the obligation of the Government to eventually determine the controversy as to whether the claim should be paid by the Government or not. It only removes that under the act of 1834 had provided that under the order of the President or by the direction of the officers of the Interior Department the money should be paid out of the Treasury, Congress having nothing to do with it.

It left that class of claims against the Government of the United States under the solemn terms of these different acts of Congress that the Government will in the mean time consider this controversy as to how they should be paid the indemnity from the Government.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In keeping up with the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio, I want to say that although the Government has had this annuity or trust fund in its hand, the payment of these claims can not now be made to the claimants out of that, because you have reached a point where, if you attempt to pay honest claimants out of the annuity fund, it will leave the Indians as paupers and dependent upon the Government for their support.

There are but a few tribes with which it can be done. The Secretary of the Interior suggests that in the future, out of the funds going to the Indians and from lands which by the act of 1887 it is provided may be sold of their reservation, the Government of the United States can indemnify itself and pay the claims out of the common Treasury; wherefore it is provided in this bill that this judicial tribunal shall make a report to the Secretary of the Interior that he may keep an account of the fund, and when he makes a debit there is a credit given for it in such fund as may be on hand or accrue as stated, and after doing that the Secretary of the Interior reports the condition of the fund, and his suggestion of how and in what manner it can be paid, and it comes to Congress in that shape. You can see very well how the interests of the Government are protected in seeking to do justice with these claims.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in doing all this, and in bringing this measure before Congress with a view of a speedy relief to the claimants, and doing justice to all parties, economy has been consulted. Here is a provision for the sum of $40,000 per annum to be appropriated for the support of the entire court and its officers annually. Under the general provision of existing laws there are $20,000 appropriated for the conduct of an investigation which lacks the formalities of a legal investigation, which fails to reach final justice, and which loads Congress and consumes its time; and when you eliminate the $20,000 now paid to this investigating bureau of the Indian Department, and come to sum up all, you will find that in providing for the expenditure of $40,000, as is done in this bill, you are making no extravagant increase of expenditure, indeed no actual increase except co nomine in the officers provided for the adjudication and payment of these claims.

Mr. SAYERS. The court is only temporary.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The court is intended to be only temporary.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. How much do you propose to pay the judges?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Four thousand dollars a year; and that is with the view of getting a tribunal whose finding and adjudication, in the language of the report of the committee, shall command alike the confidence of Congress and of the country. And I submit to the judgment of gentlemen that the interests of the Government are further protected here. Under the present mode of investigation no agent of the Department is authorized to administer an oath; all the testimony taken for or against the Government is ex parte; but under this tribunal, judicial in its character, the officers and agents employed and sent out are authorized by law to take the testimony of witnesses under oath, and their reports are to be made under oath.

Mr. DUNN. And the Secretary says that his action upon the reports of the agents now employed in these cases in approving them is entirely perfunctory.

Mr. SYMES. That is what he told us when we conferred with him.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES] and I were appointed a subcommittee to confer with the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary told us that necessarily, with the volume of business committed to him and to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the approval of these reports was in a great degree a perfunctory work. He also assured us that the Department needed this tribunal, and that he was of the opinion that every department of the Government needed the sanction of such a tribunal. Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my explanation of this bill by stating that it comes here with the unanimous report of the committee and with the approval of the Secretary. In fact, the bill is in large part the work of the Secretary of the Interior. It has also the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. These officers have looked over the whole field and recommend this as the best and most just method of disposing of these claims.

Mr. Speaker, the Government is quick in its generosity to the soldier who defends its honor and integrity. The Government moves in hot haste to discharge its obligations to the holders of its bonds. Why then should it halt in slow steps to do simple justice to the pioneer of its laws and civilization, who, invited by the plighted faith of that same Government, has offered his life and sacrificed his property to promote the power, wealth, and happiness of its citizens, for whom alone it exists?

Mr. HERMANN. In further answer to the doubt expressed by the gentleman from Ohio, I wish to read a provision of the bill:

And the Secretary of the Interior shall, at the same time, report what funds exist from which any amounts adjudicated by the court to be chargeable to any Indian tribes may be paid, and whether, in his opinion, the amounts so found chargeable should be paid by the United States or taken from such funds, together with his reasons therefor.

Mr. PETERS. Does this bill provide for any appeal in case the commission should find adversely to the claimant?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. No, sir.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It provides that the judgment shall be final.

Mr. RYAN. If I understand the bill, it provides that an adverse judgment shall be a perpetual bar to the further prosecution of the claim.

Mr. SYMES. That is what it does.

A MEMBER. The claimant is entitled to a rehearing.

Mr. SYMES. Yes, he may move for a rehearing.

Mr. PETERS. That is the point to which I wish to call attention. If the claimant presents his claim to this commission and the commission finds that something is due him, then he has a right to come to Congress and get the money appropriated to pay him. If, however, the commission should find that nothing is due him, then he has no opportunity to appeal to any higher tribunal, either the Supreme Court or Congress. Is that right?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The right to appeal to Congress is one of the rights of the American citizen of which he can not be deprived.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. But he will not have any show here.

Mr. RYAN. What sort of a show would he stand here with an adverse judgment of this tribunal?

Mr. PETERS. I was about to say that the decision of the court, together with this law which makes it a final adjudication, would leave the party but little show in this House.

Mr. HEARD. The party would be in the same position as one presenting his case here upon a report from the Court of Claims.

Mr. PETERS. I suggest that where the decision of the commission is adverse to the claimant, he should have the right to appeal, if he sees fit, to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. PERKINS. No; to the Court of Claims.

Mr. PETERS. He should have the right to appeal to some tribunal, so that if injustice had been done him (and there is no tribunal that does not occasionally commit injustice) he may have his case re-examined.

Mr. HERMANN. There is a provision in the bill for a recall of the report by the court and a rehearing. The language is as follows:

At any time before the reported judgment upon any claim shall have been included by the Secretary of the Interior in an estimate, or have been transmitted to Congress, the said court may, in its discretion, recall such report, with the accompanying papers, and grant a rehearing.

Mr. PETERS. I am aware of that provision in the bill; but nowhere in the United States is a nisi prius court permitted to give a final decision upon any question, and this commission is nothing more nor less than a nisi prius court; that is, a court that finds in the first instance the facts and the law. There should certainly be some appellate tribunal to which the party may apply if the decision is adverse to him.

Mr. MORROW. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] alluded to the fact of a commission having been created by the law providing appropriations for the support of the Indian Department. That commission, I believe, was created in 1885.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. There was no commission created; but there was given an authority to investigate.

Mr. MORROW. That investigation has been going on, as I understand, up to the present time. I would like to inquire whether there have been any reports based upon that inquiry, and, if so, whether Congress has acted upon any such reports and paid the money declared to be due?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Since the authority given in 1885, I do not think a single such claim has been passed by Congress—possibly three or four.

Mr. PERKINS. A great many have been considered and reported.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. But no appropriation has been made for the relief of the claimants.

Mr WHITTHORNE. No, sir A great many reports have been made by committees on such cases, but none have been finally acted on by both Houses. Possibly, as I have said, three or four may have been. I now yield to my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, those of us who have been in Congress any considerable length of time have learned (if we have learned anything) that this is the worst tribunal in the world in which a claimant against the Government can seek for justice; not because Congress is disposed to be unfair or unjust, not because it is indisposed to do right, but because the very conscientiousness of members teaches them the absolute impossibility of their doing exact justice between claimants and the Government.

When I was assigned by the Speaker as a member of this Committee on Indian Depredation Claims I intended to enter upon the work, as I have always entered upon all committee work, with great earnestness and seriousness. I have been zealous and industrious in attending to my committee duties ever since I have been in Congress. I have rarely ever missed a meeting of any committee to which I have been assigned. I have never left unreported any committee work assigned to me for report. But when a basket full of these claims came to me as my share at the first assignment after the organization of this committee, and when I commenced going through them, I found it an absolute impossibility for me to verify the ex parte proof which accompanied them. I am a lawyer, and I require legal evidence on all matters of this kind presented to me for determination as a member of the House or as a member of a committee. Sir, the means have not been placed at my disposal or at the disposal of the committee to try these cases. No member can undertake to do it. That is why the Secretary of the Interior has said that his expression of approval or disapproval upon these claims is absolutely perfunctory.

The Government has assumed the responsibility of indemnification in these cases. These depredations have been committed both upon the Indians and by Indians upon the citizens of the United States. Justice is absolutely denied the sufferers; and unless Congress shall organize a tribunal with full and final jurisdiction to determine these matters justice will be forever denied and the Calendars of Congress will remain forever loaded with these claims. Once in awhile a dexterous, shrewd, smart, managing member. or agent operating on a member, may get a case through, perhaps one case in a Congress, while justice is denied to all others, and even a hearing is refused to all the rest.

Now, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen talk about the bar of limitations. It is neither right nor just to allow any bar of limitations to be set up in these cases. We were asked in the consideration of this bill to allow the findings of the Secretary of the Interior in any case to be made conclusive upon the court; that is, if he approved a claim and recommended payment, that the court should be compelled to found a judgment upon that recommendation. Of course we could not permit such a provision to go into the bill.

When our committee met to consider the matter, we gave a full and patient investigation to the subject, and concluded that we ought not to permit any bar of limitations to be set up. There would be a resulting wrong against somebody if that were permitted. We concluded in the committee, concluded after consulting together and examining the mass of claims before us so far as we could, that but one course was possible for us to pursue, and that was to report a provision creating a tribunal for the adjudication and trial of these cases. We limit its existence to a period in the year 1891. It is entirely possible for the work to be finished by that time, and entirely possible for justice to be done. When Congress finds itself unable to perform its duties in respect to the liabilities which had been deliberately assumed by the Government, and continued to be assumed by it from year to year and from period to period, then Congress should create some other tribunal which can hear and determine the cases and administer justice.

It has been asserted, moreover, by members of Congress that this Government has but one single class of creditors to whom it pretended to be just, and that is the bondholders. No other claim against the Government has any assurance whatever that it will ever get a hearing or an adjudication. Congress has been laboring through three terms to enable itself to unload all of these claims and send claimants where they can get justice. It will be a great deal for the claimants to get their money appropriated even after they get a judgment on the claim. It will be a great deal and a great labor. The work of appropriations must be left to Congress, where the Constitution places it.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question in regard to the formation of this bill?

Mr. DUNN. With pleasure.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to direct the attention of the gentleman to the words in italics at the top of page 4.

And whehever in the opinion of the court——

Mr. DUNN. I am not sure that I have a copy of the bill printed in that form. I have the original bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I will direct the attention of the gentleman to this language:

And whenever in the opinion of the court the interest of the Government or Indians may require it—

Notice is to be given to the Attorney-General of the United States, who shall cause an appearance to be entered on behalf of the Government. As the bill was originally drawn it required the defense, who is either the Government or the tribe owing the annuity, or the Government as a holder of the annuity, to be invited by the court, and the Attorney-General to cause an appearance to be made on behalf of the defense. This bill has been amended by the words in italics, which I have read, where provision is made that this shall only be done when in the opinion of the court the interest of the Government or the Indians may demand it.

It occurs to me, as there is always a defense, this being a judicial proceeding—the Government being the defendant in proper person when it is to pay a claim out of its own money, and a defendant of the trust fund when the money is to be paid out of the funds of the Indians held by the Government—that in either case there should be an appearance on the part of the Government through the Attorney-General.

Mr. HEARD. To what part of the bill does the gentleman refer?

Mr. ADAMS. To the top of page 4.

Mr. LANHAM. Before the gentleman from Arkansas answers the question will he permit a suggestion?

Mr. DUNN. Certainly.

Mr. LANHAM. As an unqualified friend of the bill, I merely wish to say that one-half of the time allotted to us this evening has expired, and if we do not pass the bill within the next hour the probabilities are it will not be passed.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend certainly does not expect to pass an important bill like this without proper inquiry.

Mr. LANHAM. Certainly not; but it has been explained, the report is quite explicit, and that is all the time we have.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know; but still it is a matter on which we are to vote, and of course it is proper that we should understand its effect.

Mr. LANHAM. It has been carefully considered by the Committee on Depredation Claims; it meets the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. But as a member of this House called to cast a vote upon it, I want to have a careful consideration of the measure.

Mr. DUNN. The point raised by the gentleman from Illinois is a matter of detail, which I presume the committee will not stickle about. It was a point that was discussed at some length, and it was thought best to provide in this way. It will perhaps save a good deal of expense to the Government to dispense with the employment of special attorneys in certain cases where it is manifest that the Government will not need them.

Mr. ADAMS. Precisely.

Mr. DUNN. And the court on looking over the case can determine whether or not it is necessary.

Mr. ADAMS. In cases where the amount is small or where the facts are so clear as to admit of no question.

Mr. DUNN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ADAMS. That is satisfactory.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the previous question upon the passage of the bill and amendments.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood this bill was to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that such was the arrangement made by consent of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I hope the gentleman will not ask the previous question on the bill until the amendments have been considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If it is demanded, the bill will have to be considered by paragraphs.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I hope the House will proceed to the consideration of the bill, and that there shall be no further debate, only as the bill may require explanation.

Mr. BLOUNT. I feel some hesitation in supporting this measure. It is said, feelingly, in behalf of the Indian that he is ignorant, and that there ought to be no limitation on his claim. I think the Indian in the matter of these claims has been taken care of pretty well by claim agents. I think it has been an industry and it is quite an old one in this country. The claim agents have long been pressing these claims here and are pressing them all the while before the Departments. Many years ago, I remember, some distinguished gentlemen in this country, whose names I will not designate now, were here before Congress with a claim of $250,000 for attorney's fees in reference to certain lands. It was not strictly a matter of depredation as designated in this bill.

I happened to be on the Committee on Appropriations at that time. They were seeking to have an appropriation made for such claims in some of the appropriation bills, and I called at the Interior Department with a view of investigating the matter. One of the counsel for the claimants, it appeared, had filed a paper there many years before that. Mr. Chandler, a very upright and able man, who was the Secretary of the Interior, called my attention to a letter of one of those very men, which had been filed there many years previously, denouncing it as an infamous fraud, and giving many plausible reasons in support of that statement. But as soon as he got an interest in the matter he proposed to rob these poor Indians here, and he was pressing the claim here and at the Department.

Mr. MORGAN. Circumstances alter cases.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes; circumstances do alter cases; and there are a great many circumstances, I think, surrounding this bill which make me hesitate in its support.

I know the activity and fertility of resource of these agents, and that a great many depredation claims have been filed with the Secretary of the Interior for many years past, and have been disapproved. Now then, sir, the proposition is——

Mr. SYMES. Will the gentlemen allow me an inquiry there?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. SYMES. If I were going to discuss this matter very fully I would follow the line of argument of my friend on the futility of pressing claims to the political departments of the Government instead of to a judicial tribunal, so that the claimants may have justice done to them.

Mr. LANHAM. The Secretary of the Interior, in a letter of March 24, 1888, directed to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Depredation Claims, says: "I do not think that there should be any further unnecessary delay in the payment of such sums as have been and shall hereafter be ascertained to be justly due on such claims." He recommends that there be some provision made for the settlement of these claims.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is all very good.

Mr. LANHAM. Open the door for them so that these people may have an opportunity of presenting their claims.

Mr. BLOUNT. Where they have been before the Secretary of the Interior and have been rejected, I do not believe in bringing them back here for consideration by this court.

Mr. LANHAM. They are liable to be rejected there.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know what will be done when these claim agents can have an opportunity to bring other evidence to this court.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the gentleman not know that there are treaty stipulations with various tribes, under which the Government of the United States has bound itself to pay the Indians for any depredations that might have been committed upon them by white men; and does he not know that these depredations, if proved, are carried to the Secretary of the Treasury for him to have the claim audited in the proper Auditor's office, and there sent to the Appropriations Committee to make provision for them, and this Congress has paid a claim of $40,000 for the depredation of a white man upon some Indians.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know by what authority the Appropriations Committee can make such a payment.

Mr. HEARD. In pursuance of law.

Mr. SAYERS. Under treaty stipulations with some of the Indians if a depredation or robbery or anything of the kind is committed on the Indians and it is proven, the Government of the United States becomes responsible, and the claim, when proven fully, is sent to the Treasury and audited in the proper office, and then sent to Congress to be paid by the Committee on Appropriations as an audited claim.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know of my friend whether he says that these Indian depredation claims are audited by the Treasury Department?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not say that the claims for which this bill provides have been so audited, but I say that there are treaty stipulations with certain tribes——

Mr. BLOUNT. But we are talking about these claims, and I have never understood that these claims have been audited by any officer of the Treasury Department. On the contrary, my information is that they never have been audited.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman must not misunderstand me. I do not say that these claims have been audited.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then why talk about other matters? We are discussing these claims now.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not think that an Indian ought to have a better chance before Congress than a white man.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, I am not going into that discussion at this time. My friend and I would probably agree if we compared views as to the rights of the white man, but there is a class of white men whose alleged "rights" I am disposed to scrutinize very closely, these claim agents who get hold of these Indian claims and who have been hanging around this Capitol ever since I have known anything about it, and around the Interior Department, presenting all manner of fraudulent and rascally claims.

Mr. DUNN. And honest ones, too.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, honest ones, too.

Mr. SYMES. And (if my friend will pardon me) they will be hanging around here continually until you get three judges sitting there to pass upon these claims, and then they will desist.

Mr. BLOUNT. But I do not propose to help them in their business by giving them an opportunity to reopen these old claims that the Interior Department has decided against and bring them before this commission.

Mr. DUNN. Propose an amendment, then.

Mr. STEELE. I do not believe in the one-man power.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, I am not now discussing the question of one-man power. I am discussing the question whether, when there has been a judgment against these claims, the claim agents shall be enabled to renew them before this proposed commission, and I am not to be diverted from that question by a sneer about "the one-man power."

Mr. LAIRD. What authority has an executive officer to render a judgment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I can not get through even by 10 o'clock unless gentlemen will allow me to proceed with less interruption.

It is said by some gentlemen that they care nothing about the amount of these claims. In so far as the question whether or not the Government shall pay a proper claim is concerned, I concede the correctness of that position; but when I inquired as to the amount, I had in mind simply the question whether or not all the claims that had been heretofore passed upon by the Interior Department were to be brought before this court. So far as I am concerned, I do hope that this House will not allow this bill to pass in a form which will permit those claims that have been passed upon to be reopened. I trust that, on the contrary, the House will specifically prescribe that those cases shall not be heard by this tribunal. It can not be pretended, sir, that these claimants have not been properly represented in the past. They have been ably represented. The men who have represented these claims about this capital and elsewhere are, some of them, men of national reputation, and it is not worth while for us to deceive ourselves by statements to the contrary. I will not occupy further time in the general debate, but I shall take occasion as the bill is considered by sections to make such observations as seem to me proper under the circumstances.

Mr. McSHANE. The idea of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT], as I understand him, is to defeat the claim agents, and I would suggest that he propose an amendment prohibiting the allowance of these claims to anybody but the claimants themselves or their legal representatives.

Mr. BLOUNT. That I agree to; but I would go farther than that. Where an officer of the Government has examined into these claims through special agents provided by law as a means of gathering information about them, and where the Department has passed upon the claims and decided against them, I would treat that action as final.

So far as the auditing of claims in the Treasury Department is concerned, the action of the various Auditors can not be reversed even by the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, I am perfectly willing that any reasonable claims shall be submitted to this commission. So far as regards the mode of ascertaining what is right between the Government and these parties, I am not here to set up my judgment against that of the committee reporting the bill. But I shall certainly protest against any provision in the bill by which cases of this class heretofore disposed of in the Interior Department by virtue of law shall be placed in any better status than the claims of other persons which have been acted on in a similar way.

Mr. HEARD. As I understand, the gentleman from Georgia has no objection to the establishment of this commission if we limit its jurisdiction to claims which have not been adjudicated. Now, if we consent to such a limitation and thereby bar the consideration of claims which have heretofore been considered and rejected, we would still allow to claimants who have not had their claims considered even by the head of a Department an opportunity for a hearing before this commission. Even that, it seems to me, is a big gain in the interest of honesty and justice.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to have another "gain in the interest of honesty and justice." I would like to see struck out the proviso which repeals the statute of limitations as to these claims.

Mr. HEARD. Very well; let the gentleman formulate his amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will take great pleasure in doing so when it is in order.

[Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, general debate will now be regarded as closed, and the bill will be read by sections for amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that the bill with the amendments reported by the committee be regarded as the measure now under consideration, rather than the bill as originally introduced.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think we had better go on in the regular way.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint, three commissioners, one of whom shall be designated as chairman, and who shall hold their offices until the 31st day of December, 1891, when the same shall expire and all the functions and privileges thereof shall cease. If either of said commissioners shall not be so appointed during the present session of the Senate, the President may make such appointment during the recess thereof, but the appointee shall hold no longer than until the end of the next session thereafter ensuing during which the President shall nominate to the Senate as aforesaid. In like manner any vacancy subsequently occurring shall be filled. Each commissioner so appointed shall receive a salary at the rate of $4,000 per annum. Each of said commissioners shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, take and subscribe the oath required by law.

SEC. 2. That such commissioners shall constitute a court to be known as the "Court of Indian depredations," and as such shall possses jurisdiction and authority to inquire into and adjudicate, in the manner provided in this act, all claims of the following classes, namely:

First. All claims now authorized to be made or presented by any act of Congress, remaining in force, to the Secretary of the Interior or to any other officer of the Government.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk has not completed the reading of the section.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am willing that the whole section be read, but I supposed that under the rule the bill would be considered by paragraphs; that the several clauses in this section would be treated as separate paragraphs. With that understanding, I was about to address myself to the first subdivision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that when the reading of the section has been completed, amendments can be offered to any part of it.

Mr. BLOUNT. I accept that ruling of the Chair, though I have seen a different practice.

The Clerk concluded the reading of section 2, as follows:

Second. All claims by Indians, under the protection of any treaty with the United States, who, while residing and being upon any lawful reservation provided for them, shall have suffered a loss of property through unlawful destruction or taking by white men, or by Indians of another tribe or nation then belonging to the United States and not authorized to be upon the reservation where such destruction or taking occurred.

Third. All just offsets and counter-claims to any claim of either of the preceding classes which may be before such court for determination.

For such purposes, the said court shall have authority to issue subpœnas for witnesses, to be signed by its clerk or one of said commissioners and attested in the name of the chairman; to make rules and regulations, not inconsistent with law, to govern the methods of procedure and practice in and before such court, the appearance of parties in person or by attorney, and all matters pertaining and needful to the due performance of the duties of said court; and to preserve order and punish for contempt. Such regulations of practice shall be so prescribed as to provide for the expeditious, just, and fair disposition of such claims as may come before the court, without unnecessary technicalities, according to the rights of claimants upon the merits. No claimant shall be required to appear by attorney, and every case submitted by the claimant in person shall receive prompt and careful consideration in its order. But if any claim shall be prosecuted by attorney, notice shall be given by the court, in such form as it may prescribe, to the Attorney-General of the United States, and it shall thereupon be his duty to cause his appearance to be entered on behalf of the Government or of the Indians charged with liability and thereafter properly to represent and defend the interests involved.

The amendments reported by the committee to section 2 were read, as follows:

In line 6, strike out "now," and insert "for Indian depredations."

After the word "Government," in the third line of the second paragraph, insert: "Provided, That in determining the liability of the United States to pay these claims, or any part thereof, the question of limitation as to the time and manner of presenting them as prescribed by statutes shall be waived by the court."

Before the word "notice," in line 36, insert, "and wherever in the opinion of the court the interest of the Government or Indians may require it."

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope, Mr. Speaker, my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] will allow the proviso submitted as an amendment to the second paragraph of section 2 to be struck out. That is the proviso in these words:

Provided, That in determining the liability of the United States to pay these claims, or any part thereof, the question of limitation as to time and manner of presenting them as prescribed by statutes shall be waived by the court.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I agree to the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. PERKINS. It occurs to me that this amendment should not go out.

Mr. BLOUNT. You had better allow it to go out, if you want the bill to pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment to insert the proviso just read will be disagreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I move to strike out the second paragraph, commencing with line 14, down to line 21.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not there is a statute of limitations against these claims.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH, of Arizona. Was not a statute of limitations passed in the Forty-seventh Congress?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Never.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is on the remaining amendments proposed by the committee.

The amendments to the section were adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi insist upon his amendment?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I withdraw it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a further amendment, as a separate paragraph, to come in after line 24, after the word "determination," as follows:

And the aforesaid court shall not consider any claim which has been rejected by any officer authorized by law to consider the same.

Mr. HEARD. I would suggest the word "adjudicate" in place of "consider."

Mr. BLOUNT. Very well; if that is more in accordance with the legal phraseology of the bill, I have no objection to that change.

Mr. SAYERS. That might prove an injustice in many cases, for instance in the case of a claim that was filed too late. There are a great many just claims which may not have been filed within the time, and were rejected solely on that ground.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know how many there are; they may be fifty years old. There ought to be some limit, and not reopen all adjudicated claims.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I propose a further amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

The aforesaid court shall not consider any claim which has been heard and rejected by any Department or officer of the Government authorized by law to adjudicate the same.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I now offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia.

The Clerk read as follows:

That said court shall not have jurisdiction of any claim that has been heretofore adjudicated by an authorized officer of the Government, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that injustice has been done the claimant.

[Mr. STOCKDALE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I have a word to say, and shall occupy but a moment. That amendment changes materially the effect of the amendment I have offered. I do not see why that provision should apply to this class of claims any more than to the claim of a white man, as my friend has seen fit to suggest, who has a claim before any officer of the Government.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I trust the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his amendment and permit us to accept that of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment of Mr. STOCKDALE was rejected.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BLOUNT was adopted.

Section 3 of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the said court shall hold its sessions in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and the Secretary of the Interior shall provide for the said court, its clerks, and employés, hereinafter authorized, suitable rooms, with necessary furniture, fuel, lights, books, and stationery. Two commissioners shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest, directly or indirectly, or in which he is of kin to any claimant. A docket of all claims, showing the date of presentation, number, name of claimant, subject-matter, amount of claim, and the adjudication, and also a record of the proceedings of the commission shall be kept by the clerk. Subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the said court may appoint a secretary, a stenographer, and messenger, and such additional clerks as may be from time to time found necessary. The secretary shall receive a salary of $2,000, the stenographer a salary of $1,200, the messenger a salary of $840; and additional clerks, if any, such compensation as shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

After the word "stationery," in line 4, insert as a proviso:

"Provided, That whenever in the opinion of said commissioners the interests of the Government may require it, the said court may hold a session or sessions at or near the scene of the alleged site of the depredations for which a claim or claims are filed before it."

In line 14, strike out the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior." Begin a new paragraph with "The," where it occurs at the end of line 14. Add to line 20, after the word "and," where it occurs the second time, the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior;" and in line 20, after the word "dollars," insert "per annum."

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I ask that the section be read as proposed to be amended. There are quite a number of amendments.

Mr. PERKINS. I can hand the gentlemen a bill with the printed amendments incorporated. We have but a little time left now to dispose of the bill.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Very well; I withdraw the demand.

The amendments proposed by the committee were adopted.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire now to offer a substitute for a part of the section, beginning with the first line and ending with line 14. I move to strike out the portion of the section I have indicated, and insert what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a majority of said commission shall constitute a quorum to do business, and they shall hold their regular sessions in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, commencing on the first Monday in September and ending on the 31st of May of each year. That from the 1st day of June until the 31st day of August of each year, said commissioners shall each visit such separate portions of the country, to be arranged by themselves, within which Indian depredations have been committed, for the purpose of investigating and taking additional testimony, when such evidence may, in the opinion of the commissioners, be necessary to a just determination of the claims, and said commissioners, before taking such additional evidence, shall give thirty days' notice by publication in some newspaper most convenient and most liable to be read by the claimants, of the time and place of the taking of said additional testimony.

The amendment was rejected.

Section 4 of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 4. That immediately upon the organization of said court the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be delivered to it all papers, reports, evidence, and proceedings now on file or of record in the Department of the Interior, or the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of War shall, in like manner, deliver all such papers, records, and proceedings in the Department of War, relating to any claims not heretofore adjudicated by Congress of the nature hereinbefore indicated. Other and additional claims may be presented to the court by petition, setting forth in ordinary and concise language, without unnecessary repetition, the facts upon which such claims are based, including the circumstances immediately connected with the commission of the wrongs complained of, the persons by whom committed, the property lost or destroyed, and any other facts connected with the transactions and material to the proper adjudication of the cases involved; and may be required to be verified by the affidavit of the claimant, his agent, or attorney, as shall be prescribed by the court. In considering the merits of the claims presented to the court, all testimony and reports of special agents, and other papers now on file in either of the Departments aforesaid, or in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and all such testimony as may be taken pursuant to the regulations of the commission, and all reports of special agents, as hereinafter provided, shall be entertained by the court, and such value awarded thereto as in its judgment is right and proper, without limitation by the technical rules of evidence in courts of law. But every case shall be heard by a quorum, at least, of the court, acting jointly and not by individual commissioners; and the conclusion in respect to facts and of law thereon shall be so jointly found and determined. Each of said commissioners and their secretary is authorized to administer oaths to witnesses.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

After the word "affairs," in line 5, insert "or the office of the Secretary of the Senate, or the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives."

Also in line 16 insert after the word "persons" the words "class of persons, tribe, or tribes;" and in line 27 strike out the word "commission" and insert "court."

The amendments were adopted.

The Clerk read section 5, as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior may appoint not to exceed five special agents, who shall each be paid a salary of $2,000 per annum, and the further sum of $3 per day for traveling expenses for each day actually employed in traveling or absence from home upon official duty. Each such agent shall have power to administer oaths, to take depositions, and to procure investigations; and they shall perform such duties as may be required by the court and under its direction, and shall make report to the court in writing of their proceedings, and of all evidence taken in any case which they shall be directed to investigate.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 1, after the word "Interior," insert "upon the requirement of the said court."

In line 8 strike out "procure" and insert "prosecute."

In line 12, after the word "investigate," insert "The Secretary of the Interior shall cause the accounts of said agents to be audited and approved, such accounts to be sworn to by the agents and vouchers produced showing how many days they were so employed, and each item of such necessary expenses."

Mr. STOCKDALE. I move to strike out section 5.

[Mr. STOCKDALE withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to strike out section 5.

The motion to strike out the section was rejected.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to.

The Clerk read section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the court shall make, after inquiry and adjudication, a special and separate report upon each claim before it, in which shall be succinctly stated the facts found by the court in respect to the loss or destruction of the property, or other circumstances of the injury which forms the basis of the claim, and the nature and quantity of property lost or destroyed, the value thereof in detail, the tribe of Indians or other persons by whom the wrong was committed, and the amount determined to be due to the claimant, if any, by reason of the facts; and such amount shall not in any case exceed the value of the property lost or destroyed at the time of such loss or destruction; and shall adjudge the liability of the United States, or of any tribe of Indians, for the payment of the amount so found due. If any such claim be disallowed, such conclusion shall be reported in like manner; and any claim so adjudged to be disallowed shall be thereafter forever determined and barred accordingly. Such reports shall be addressed to, and filed with, the Secretary of the Interior, and be accompanied by all the testimony and papers on file in the said court in relation thereto; and the Secretary of the Interior shall annually submit, through the Secretary of the Treasury, to Congress, an estimate for the payment of the amounts allowed against the United States, and when, in his opinion, the amounts adjudged to be chargeable against any tribe of Indians should be paid by the United States, a separate estimate for such sums; and the Secretary of the Interior shall annually transmit to Congress, by communication to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, a list of the claims embraced in such estimates, giving the general particulars of each case, and there with the several reports of the court aforesaid adjudicating the same, but not transmitting the papers and testimony accompanying, except as may be specially required; and the Secretary of the Interior shall, at the same time, report what funds exist from which any amounts adjudicated by the court to be chargeable to any Indian tribes may be paid, and whether, in his opinion, the amounts so found chargeable should be paid by the United States or taken from such funds, together with his reasons therefor. The amounts so adjudged by the said court shall be a final and conclusive determination of the full and true amounts due the several claimants, respectively, on account of such claims, and upon the payment thereof, pursuant to any act of appropriation therefor, all such claims shall be finally satisfied. At any time before the reported judgment upon any claim shall have been included by the Secretary of the Interior in an estimate, or have been transmitted to Congress, the said court may, in its discretion, recall such report, with the accompanying papers, and grant a rehearing; but after either of the acts aforesaid in any case by the Secretary of the Interior the jurisdiction of the said court shall be determined as to such claims.

Mr. PERKINS. I wish to offer an amendment to this section, but desire that the bill may be read through, and I can offer it if there is time after the bill has been read.

The amendments reported by the committee are as follows:

In line 8, after the word "persons," insert "or class of persons;" and in line 51, after the word "determined," insert "and final."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read section 7, as follows:

SEC. 7. That all claims of the character mentioned in this act, which shall not be presented to the said court within three years after the passage hereof, shall be forever barred.

The Clerk read the following amendment:

After section 7, insert section 8, as follows:

"SEC. 8. That said court shall hold two regular sessions each year in the city of Washington, D. C.; the first session shall commence on the second Monday in January and end on the 31st day of May; the second session shall commence on the first Monday in September and end on the 20th day of December of each year."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee recommended an amendment, which was agreed to, changing section 8 of the original bill to section 9; which was read, as follows:

SEC. 9. That there be, and hereby is, appropriated from the Treasury of the United States, out of any moneys not otherwise appropriated, $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the salaries of the commissioners and other officers and employés herein provided for, and such other expenses as are authorized to be made by this act, which shall be disbursed by the disbursing clerk of the Department of the Interior in the same manner in which salaries and expenses of that Department are authorized to be paid.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SYMES. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen may have leave to print remarks in regard to this bill in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. BLOUNT: A bill (H. R. 10919) to make valid a deed to a certain tract of land in Bibb County, Georgia, made and delivered by Brig. Gen. Davis Tilson—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BOUTELLE: A bill (H. R. 10920) granting a pension to Martha Wine—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 10922) granting a pension to William Harper—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MATSON: A bill (H. R. 10923) granting a pension to Charles J. Brickert—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STONE, of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 10924) for the relief of William M. Cox—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILSON, of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 10925) for the relief of Henry Menhenitt—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Change in the reference of a bill improperly referred was made in the following case, namely:

The bill (H. R. 10511) for the relief of William N. H. Mack—from the Committee on Invalid Pensions to the Committee on War Claims.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAYNE: Petition of Sewickly Council, No. 170, and of Vesuvius Council, Junior Order of United American Mechanics of Sharpsburgh, Pa., in favor of Senate bill 553—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BURNES: Memorial of J. G. Hollingsworth, for reduction of certain taxation—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CATCHINGS: Petition of W. D. Andrews and 101 others, citizens of Bolivar County, Mississippi, for amendment of the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CHEADLE: Petition of 17 ex-soldiers of Clinton County, Indiana, in favor of the $8 a month service-pension law—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Indiana, for a prohibitory constitutional amendment—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of William Becker and 25 others, citizens of the Ninth district of Indiana, for prohibition in the District of Columbia—to the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. CROUSE: Petition of citizens of Cuyahoga Falls, Ohio, in favor of House bill 8716—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. LAGAN: Petition of Local Assembly No. 8386, and of Local Assembly No. 102 of New Orleans, La., in favor of House bill 8716—to the Committee on Labor.

The following petition for the more effectual protection of agriculture, by means of certain import duties, was received and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GROUT: Of J. R. Crane and 19 others, of Bridport, Vt.

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 23, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of July 17, 1888, certain information in respect to the removal of the National Quarantine Station from Ship Island to some other point in the Gulf of Mexico under the provisions of the act of March 15, 1888, authorizing such removal and making an appropriation therefor; which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from the Commissioner of Education, transmitting resolutions adopted at the annual session of the National Educational Association of the United States, recently held in San Francisco, Cal., indorsing the work done by the Bureau of Education, and favoring the erection of a suitable building exclusively for the use of that bureau; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Tangipahoa Parish, Louisiana, and a petition of citizens of Travis and Williamson Counties, Texas, praying for the passage of certain amendments of the interstate-commerce law; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I present a memorial of the Board of Trade, of Jacksonville, Fla., remonstrating against any legislation to the end of giving some protection or trade-mark right to Key West manufacturers of cigars in the use of the words "Key West." I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I present a petition of certain citizens of the county of Osage, in the State of Kansas, calling attention to the alleged violations of the interstate-commerce act, and suggesting an amendment especially providing that no railroad subject to the provisions of the interstate-commerce act shall transport any commodity in any car owned by the shipper. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Hillsborough County, Florida, praying for such disposition of the Fort Brooke military reservation in that county as will not conflict with the rights of settlers thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendments and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 9920) granting a pension to Daniel K. Harris;

A bill (H. R. 881) granting a pension to Hiram R. Ellis;

A bill (H. R. 965) granting a pension to George E. Wells; and

A bill (H. R. 9029) for the relief of Marshall Burtrum.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3331) to grant to the city of Chadron, Nebr., the right to lay pipe lines across certain tracts of land, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2715) for the relief of certain parties who have paid $2.50 per acre for United States Government lands reduced in price to $1.25 per acre by the act of Congress approved June 15, 1880, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1585) providing for the location of scrip issued under the acts of August 31, 1852, and June 22, 1860, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRAY introduced a bill (S. 3366) to provide for an American register for the steamer Saginaw, of New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JOHN F. COOK.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be directed to report the balance due, if any, to John F. Cook, as collector of taxes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.

PRINTING OF TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 500 additional copies of House bill No. 9051, "to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue," as passed by the House of Representatives, said copies to be delivered to the document-room of the Senate.

Mr. BECK. How many copies does the resolution propose to print?

Mr. MANDERSON. Five hundred copies of the bill as it passed the House of Representatives. They will be placed in the document-room.

Mr. BECK. Is not that very few for us to have? There is demand for it.

Mr. MANDERSON. The reason for fixing that number is that there has been a large distribution of the bill from the House, and the Senate Committee on Printing thought it would delay until later in the session, and then perhaps recommend the printing of more copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, the question is on agreeing to the same.

The resolution was agreed to.

TORPEDOES AND TORPEDO EXPERIMENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Naval Affairs have reported an amendment of the Naval appropriation bill proposing to appropriate $100,000 for torpedoes and torpedo experiments. I ask unanimous consent to have printed for the use of the Senate a paper on that subject prepared by Lieutenant Jaques, of the Navy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, if there be no objection.

ACCOUNTS UNDER THE EIGHT-HOUR LAW.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the bill (S. 405) providing for the adjustment of accounts of laborers, workmen, and mechanics arising under the eight-hour law be printed as it passed the Senate, there being several amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

HANNAH H. LATHAM.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 8506) for the relief of Hannah H. Latham. It is a pension bill on the Calendar reported favorably. The pension has just been allowed by the Pension Office. Fearing that there may be some mistake, I ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge;
A bill (H. R. 3055) for the relief of A. F. Saint Sure Lindefelt;
A bill (H. R. 4504) granting a pension to Nancy Baldwin;
A bill (H. R. 5123) to increase the pension of Charles Ritchey;
A bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant;
A bill (H. R. 6371) granting a pension to Jesse M. Stilwell;
A bill (H. R. 9130) granting a pension to Susan Singleton;
A bill (H. R. 9263) granting an increase of pension to Abraham J. Buckles;
A bill (H. R. 9358) to increase the pension of Rosalie O'Sullivan;
A bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey;
A bill (H. R. 9672) granting a pension to Eliza A. Williamson; and
A bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh.

The message also announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1426) supplementary to the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and also of the act of July 2, 1864, and other acts amendatory of said first-named act, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DOCKERY, Mr. ANDERSON of Mississippi, and Mr. PETERS managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10573) to provide for one additional associate justice of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. KILGORE, and Mr. WARNER managers of the conference on the part of the House.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DOLPH. I was not in to hear the Journal read this morning, but I observe in the RECORD the following:

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. DOLPH. Is a conference report in order, Mr. President?
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The conference reports are privileged.
Mr. EDMUNDS. Before I call for the regular order, I move that that conference report be printed, so that we can see exactly what it is.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know to what conference report the Senator from Vermont refers. The title of the bill on which the conference report submitted by the Senator from Oregon is made will be reported by the Secretary.
The Chief Clerk read as follows:
"Report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9859) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes."

What occurred was that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] asked unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] on the fisheries treaty the bridge bills on the Calendar might be considered. I was not aware that the conference report had come from the House of Representatives, or whether the conference report had been submitted to the Senate or not, and not seeing the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in his seat, I simply wanted to ascertain whether, if the order was made for the consideration of bridge bills, it would prevent the consideration of that conference report. It looks as if I had in some way interfered with the conduct of the conference report by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce. I desired to make a statement of what occurred. It is quite natural that this should have occurred, because when I asked the question the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] treated it as if something had been done about a conference report, but I was not aware that any such conference report was before the Senate.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate proceed, as in open executive session, to the consideration of the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] in reference to the fisheries treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration, in open executive session, of the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama and the fisheries treaty.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. MORGAN. I raise a question of order upon the motion. My resolutions were offered in open legislative session. They are legislative resolutions, and I am not aware of any rule of the Senate that authorizes us to transfer legislative business to either open or closed executive session.

Mr. DAWES. All I know is that that is the usual form in which the motion has been made heretofore. Whether in legislative or executive session, I suppose is a matter of indifference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the question of order the Chair takes the liberty to observe that the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama have been treated as a portion of the subject to be considered in open executive session, and it is the recollection of the Chair that the order of the Senate was that they should be considered together. If a mistake has been made it was inadvertent.

The recollection of the Chair also is that whenever the fisheries treaty has been called up for consideration it has been the claim of the Senator from Alabama that his resolutions were entitled to priority and precedence, and he has insisted on several occasions that that order should not be disturbed. The resolutions of the Senator from Alabama have been journalized as legislative business, the Chair is informed, and the difficulty has arisen from the claim the Senator from Alabama has made whenever the fisheries treaty has been under consideration that his resolutions were entitled to priority of consideration. Does the Senator from Alabama desire any further ruling upon the point of order?

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to make a statement about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will listen to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. The RECORD does not show that I have ever said one word on that subject—not a word. The RECORD ought to show it if I have ever said anything on the subject; and I deny the recollection of the Chair as to putting me in a correct attitude upon that proposition. I offered the resolutions as legislative resolutions——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be so treated.

Mr. MORGAN. And not with my consent or on my motion or on my advice at any time at all have those resolutions ever been carried into the executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me, I will say that in his absence and to favor his proposition the precise thing was done that the President of the Senate stated.

Mr. MORGAN. But it was not done by me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Perhaps it was not done by you, but it was done by your friends on your side of the Chamber, and it was supposed to give your resolutions priority.

Mr. MORGAN. No——

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to state that whenever the time comes to vote on the treaty I propose to move to lay the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama on the table as a question absolutely indifferent and irrelevant to the matter pending; but I do not wish to do it until the debate is closed. Then, instead of voting for or against these moot resolutions, as I call them (for they are nothing but moot resolutions; they are not before us), I shall take the sense of the Senate upon the motion to lay them on the table. But the position of the resolutions is precisely as the Senator was supposed to desire it. However, if that is not the case, I will vote to let them go wherever he desires to place them.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senate desires to consider the resolutions I have no objection to their being considered in open executive session; but in open executive session I should have a very indefinite line of action marked out for me to pursue by any precedent or rule of the Senate. I do not know how to handle a matter of that kind, a resolution respecting a report of a majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon a treaty, as a matter that belongs to the treaty in any sense whatever.

The Senator from Ohio says it is a moot question. It may be a moot question, Mr. President, but it is not a mute one by any means, and will not be a mute one either, and his motion to lay the resolutions on the table will not make them mute. The resolutions will be discussed here in some form, or in some place, or at some time, and a vote of the Senate will be had upon them. A motion to lay the resolutions upon the table will not get rid of them lightly. Senators will have to declare themselves upon the yeas and nays whether the time for negotiation with Great Britain upon the subject of the fisheries has passed. That is the great proposition in the resolutions, and this country will want to know whether that time has passed or not.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] has also a resolution on the same subject, which might be characterized as dealing with precisely the same proposition that is embodied in my resolutions. I have two and he has one. What becomes of his resolution? It stands on the legislative Calendar. Mine go into executive session. I propose, when the Senator from New Hampshire offers his resolution for consideration by the Senate, to offer mine as a substitute. I can not take them out of executive session to offer them in legislative session as a substitute without first obtaining the consent of the Senate.

The Senator from New Hampshire is evidently as anxious about this moot question as I am, and when he brings forward for consideration his resolution, which is now upon the table, I shall desire to discuss it with him and to have the ordinary opportunity of testing the sense of the Senate, whether my resolutions are not a good substitute for his.

So I do not want to get the matter into a tangle. If my resolutions go into open executive session, let that of the Senator from New Hampshire go in likewise.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. After, I think, the remarks on the treaty by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], when the Senator from Alabama moved that his resolutions be postponed until the next Monday when the treaty was to come up in regular order, I certainly understood it to be his desire that his resolutions should be considered in connection with the treaty. The Chair has that impression; I think that was the impression of the Senate; and also the Senator from Ohio is correct when he says that he understood distinctly that the precedence of the resolutions presented by the Senator from Alabama was reserved.

I offered the resolution which I presented in order to bring it before the Senate, expecting it to be considered in connection with the treaty and the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama, and I intended whenever the Senate came to a vote on the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama to move my resolution as a substitute for one of his.

Under these circumstances, I can not understand why the Senator from Alabama is not willing to allow his resolutions and the resolution which I presented to be considered in connection with the treaty, and to allow the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to go on with his remarks.

Mr. MORGAN. It is only a question of order; nothing else. I am willing to have it in one form of open session or another form of open session; it makes no difference with me. But when we get to questions under our rules which arise upon this treaty we shall find ourselves very much embarrassed, or at least I would, in getting the Senate to consider my resolutions at all.

The treaty is before the Senate for consideration and nothing else. The rules of the Senate are very specific as to the manner of our action in considering treaties. They are to be considered as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment, and when the Senate has come to a final conclusion as to what the text of the treaty ought to be to suit its judgment, then a separate resolution is to be moved, which is to lie over for one day unless by unanimous consent it is taken up sooner, and on that resolution the question of ratification is taken. I do not know how I could interject my resolutions into a proceeding of that kind. It would be entirely irregular.

So it has been my purpose all the time to keep the resolutions where they belong, in the legislative session. I think we had better discuss and determine the resolutions, which relate to the report of the majority of the committee on a question of great policy and public duty that is presented in that report, on the legislative Calendar, and not put them into this new-fangled idea of an open executive session. You can not work them in; there is no way that you can get consideration of them that I can understand under parliamentary rules.

Mr. DAWES. I will inquire of the Senator what is to hinder him, whether it be in open executive session or in legislative session, from moving the words of his resolutions, wherever they may be, as a substitute for the resolution of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MORGAN. I can do that as a matter of course, but why should I wait for three or four weeks to get a chance to debate my resolutions, and then have them put in where the Senator from New Hampshire may choose to call them up or not?

Mr. DAWES. I understood the Senator to anticipate some point of order, that after his resolutions were in executive session he could not move the same resolutions.

Mr. MORGAN. I can move the same resolutions in legislative session, as a matter of course.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see any difficulty.

Mr. MORGAN. I can do that, but I do not care to put myself entirely under the control of any Senator here in what I conceive to be a part of my public duty. I insist that my resolutions are legislative resolutions, and have not gone by the vote or consent of the Senate into open executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama took occasion, the Chair thought, with something of asperity, to deny the correctness of the recollection of the Chair. The Chair can only say that he has been actuated by a sincere and scrupulous desire to protect what he conceived to be the rights of the Senator from Alabama as suggested by him. If there was an error it was unintentional. In the absence of the Senator from Alabama the Chair repeatedly announced the precedence of the resolutions of the Senator from Alabama, believing that to be what he desired.

The Senator from Alabama stating that his resolutions are not to be hereafter considered in connection with the treaty, but are to be placed upon the legislative Calendar where they were first assigned, that order will be pursued.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration, in open executive session, of the fisheries treaty. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. FRYE. Pending that I desire to submit a conference report.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me just one moment to say to the Chair that I had not the slightest idea of reflecting in any feeling or term of asperity upon the action of the Chair? I merely wished to take issue with the Chair upon what I saw was a very clear mistake, as I thought, that I had made a motion to carry my resolutions into the open executive session. I entirely exonerate the Chair from any sort of intention or purpose to embarrass me or my resolutions in regard to this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] desires to submit the report of a committee of conference. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9859) "making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 17, 18, 20, 27, 39, 64, 65, 82, 94, 99, 101, 111, 112, 115, 119, 120, 121, 122, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 157, 158, 160, 173, 180, 181, 184, 186, 192, 193, 194, 196, 197, 198, 199, 201, 202, 203, 205, 206, 216, 217, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 254.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 37, 40, 41, 42, 46, 47, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 66, 67, 68, 69, 71, 72, 73, 74, 76, 77, 78, 79, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 95, 96, 97, 98, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 113, 114, 116, 117, 118, 123, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 131, 138, 139, 140, 141, 148, 156, 159, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 171, 172, 174, 175, 177, 178, 179, 182, 185, 187, 191, 195, 207, 208, 209, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 250, 251, 252, 253, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 319.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$20,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$35,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

CHURCH OF THE ASCENSION.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1099) for the relief of the Church of the Ascension, in the District of Columbia. It is a very brief bill, and will require no discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can entertain the motion only with the consent of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], who has moved an executive session.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to allow me to call up this bill. I am obliged to be absent.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the Senator is about to leave, and therefore I will yield.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1099) for the relief of the Church of the Ascension of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all taxes and assessments, general and special, with the interest and penalties now due and unpaid theron upon lots 1, 2, and 3, in square 282, in the city of Washington, D. C., now owned and occupied by the Church of the Ascension, be, and the same hereby are, remitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER. I am much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 19th instant approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. 1669) authorizing the Mississippi and Louisiana Bridge and Railroad Company of Natchez, Miss., to construct a bridge over the Mississippi River at or near Natchez, Miss.;

An act (S. 123) granting a pension to Mrs. Virginia Grier;

An act (S. 1173) increasing the pension of Jeptha A. Jones;

An act (S. 1556) granting a pension to Martha N. Kellogg;

An act (S. 2274) granting a pension to Mrs. Catherine K. Whittlesey;

An act (S. 2604) granting a pension to Mrs. Loanda Sherman;

An act (S. 2866) granting a pension to Abel G. Rankin;

An act (S. 3021) granting a pension to Carrie V. Miller; and Joint resolution (S. R. 96) authorizing the District commissioners to designate a site for a statue of Benjamin Franklin.

The message also announced that the President had, on the 23d instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 1540) granting a pension to Hannah Babb Hutchins;

An act (S. 671) to provide for the sale of the site of Fort Omaha, Nebraska, the sale or removal of the improvements thereof, and for a new site and the construction of suitable buildings thereon; and

An act (S. 321) for the relief of Zeb Ward, of Little Rock, Ark.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration in open executive session of the fisheries treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is now in open executive session. The reading of the Journal of the last open executive session will be dispensed with, if there be no objection. The Chief Clerk will report the treaty by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. Treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the interpretation of the convention of October 20, 1818, signed at Washington, February 15, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first article thereof.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I am aware that the debate upon this subject is well-nigh exhausted, and ordinarily I should feel that propriety required that it be now turned over to those who have it in charge for such considerations as they might desire to submit in conclusion before the vote is taken. But there are some reasons which may occur to Senators why I have felt that the Senate might indulge me in a few remarks upon the treaty, notwithstanding the condition of the debate to which I have alluded. I therefore venture to tax still further the heated weariness of Senators while I ask them to listen to a few observations upon one feature of this discussion.

There has been much debate upon the text of the treaty, its meaning, and its scope. I shall dismiss that point with the single remark that in my judgment it does not become us in this day to approve any treaty about the meaning and scope of the phraseology of which there can be honest debate in the Senate of the United States.

As to the historical argument, until the elaborate and in my opinion unanswerable arguments drawn from that source by my colleague [Mr. HOAR] and others who have pursued the debate in that line shall find some answer, I shall not venture to trouble the Senate with any remarks in that field.

As to the rum and molasses argument of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], in which he found so much delight, about which he lingered so long, and which he left so reluctantly, I have only to say that I shall not contend with him in that controversy. I shall let his rum and molasses argument remain where he left it, for I can assure him that whether it reels with the one or sticks in the other, it is alike impotent in this debate.

I can assure him that the title of the United States to the northeastern fisheries has about it no uncertainty either as to its date or its origin. Long after the treaty of Utrecht, on which he dwelt and behind which the Senator concealed so much of what he had to say, the French Government erected a fortress at Louisburg for the avowed purpose of destroying the fishing rights of the British nation in those waters. They were thirty years in building it, and spent $5,000,000 in erecting a fortress for that purpose more formidable than any that has since been erected upon this continent.

But in 1745, 4,000 New England men, exactly 4,070, of which Connecticut furnished 516, New Hampshire 304, and Massachusetts 3,250, organized an expedition at their own expense and under their own commander and captured that fortress. Its guns were spiked by the garrison which fled at their approach. A blacksmith from my own county, whose descendants are now my own neighbors, with twenty men under him, drilled out the spikes of the cannon and turned them upon the town.

Years afterwards, when that fortress had gone back into the hands of the French, it was again retaken by New England men, who followed from their victory there Wolfe to the siege of Quebec, where there were more men from the New England colonies than from all the other British colonies on this continent.

The blood and prowess of the New England fishermen won for the British crown whatever fishing rights it ever had in those waters, and the same man who planned the siege of Louisburg in the first fight threw up the intrenchments thirty years later at Bunker Hill, and the very same drums that headed the column in the triumphal march into that city in 1745 were heard again at Bunker Hill. It was at Bunker Hill, at Saratoga, and at Yorktown that the United States won from Great Britain what their same blood won for Great Britain thirty years before.

The Declaration of Independence is the title of the United States to the fisheries in the northern ocean. The treaty of 1783 is but the recital. When that treaty was adopted the rights of the United States in those waters were precisely the same as the rights of the British crown. Whatever a British fisherman could do there, a citizen of the United States could do, and wherever a British subject could drop a line, by his side could stand an American citizen and do likewise. Whoever could measure the rights of Great Britain in those waters measured at the same time the rights of the United States there. They were tenants in common.

Mr. MORGAN. This is a very interesting statement of the Senator, in which I fully concur. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if his information of the rights of the colonies in regard to fishing is that Canadians prior to the Revolutionary war had the same fishing rights upon all of the coasts down to Georgia that we had up in Canadian waters? Were they mutual colonial rights?

Mr. DAWES. Some time when the Senator and I have leisure and I am not otherwise engaged, as I am just at this moment, I will sit at his feet, and, as I know, learn about that feature of the case.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon for the interruption. I did not suppose it would be regarded as such.

Mr. DAWES. What I propose to say to-day will have no reference to that point, and therefore the Senator will know, without any disrespect, that I desire not to be turned off from the line of my remarks.

If to-day the title of the United States to fishing rights in those waters falls short one particle of the title which the United States had when the treaty of 1783 was signed, it is the result of our diplomacy. The map to-day will enable any one to discern whether we have succeeded in maintaining the rights we then unquestionably had, and it will determine whether we are to-day standing where we did then in the possession of co-equal and co-extensive rights in those waters with Great Britain herself.

To those who keep in mind just how we obtained those rights it is not a pleasant sight to look on the different colors on that map. If by the approval of this treaty the condition of things shall undergo on that map still another change, like the changes which it has undergone up to now, it will be the result also of diplomacy. You see the colors now. By and by, if this treaty shall be approved, other colors also must be substituted upon the points indicated by the red lines, and he who shall hereafter look upon that map and then upon the map that our fathers delivered to us, will comprehend the value to the United States in this regard of the diplomacy which has dominated in those waters.

The first departure, the first surrender, was in the treaty of 1818, and out of it has grown all our woe. I quite agree with those who have discussed the question heretofore in saying that we made the concessions which have brought upon us all the controversy and all the trouble that have followed from 1818 to this day. We made it for what we termed, what we believed then, was an equivalent consideration. We bought for the 3-mile limit the right of fishing vessels to go into harbors for the purpose of shelter and repairing damages therein, of purchasing wood and obtaining water, and for no other purposes. Reading that at the present day, and in the light of the liberalized commerce of these times, it sounds like a beggarly consideration for this renunciation:

> And the United States hereby renounce forever any liberty heretofore enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within 3 marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of His Britannic Majesty's dominions in America not included within the above-mentioned limits.

It was thought at the time to be an equivalent consideration. As I have said, the negotiators on the part of the United States were sadly mistaken. They had, as Sir Charles Tupper said to Sir John A. Macdonald, but to wait. Everything comes to him who waits in a good cause. The ports of the colonies would have been open not only to the fishermen, but to all the full privileges and hospitalities of commerce in a few years had they been content to wait and abide the irresistible progress of events.

But, sir, that treaty was ratified. That treaty is the bond of to-day. It was a hard bargain, but those whom it affects most seriously are willing to abide by it to the letter. Whatever was nominated in the bond, the pound of flesh exacted of our commissioners and the American people at that time, is theirs, it shall be faithfully rendered; but if there is anything on which the American people entertain one settled fixed purpose, it is that it is only to the letter that the bond shall be exacted.

The present treaty is an experiment of a new administration in this field where so few laurels have been gathered heretofore by the diplomacy of the United States. It were well worthy of any administration to contemplate all the difficulties that have arisen, all the demands of Great Britain that have been set up and opposed and condemned by every statesman and administration since 1818 under that treaty. It were well worthy the ambition of any Administration to consider whether it is not in their power to recover ground heretofore lost, and if possible restore, if not absolutely, as nearly as may be the condition of things which our fathers delivered over to us. If the present Administration had entered into the negotiation with any such purpose as that, and with any such spirit as gave notice to those whom it met that they were not there for further concession, but that they were there for observance of the mutual obligations the two countries had entered into, in my opinion a far different result would have been attained than the treaty before us.

The treaty before us is not put by either its negotiators or its friends on this floor upon any such consideration as that it was an attempt to recover, least of all that it had succeeded in recovering, one foot of the ground lost in the past, and lost under circumstances and conditions which have brought upon the country all of its embarrassments. It is put upon the condition that concessions have been added to the concessions heretofore made, and those concessions, it is thought by its negotiators on our part and the friends of the treaty here, are to be justified upon the ground of the extravagance and enormity of the unjustifiable demands which the British Government has been making for seventy years—demands that no American statesman, until the consideration of this treaty, ever sought to justify or failed to denounce. This treaty is commended to the Senate of the United States and to the country as a treaty of peace; that it composes difficulties without attempting to show that they are composed by maintaining the ground we have hitherto maintained, by compelling Great Britain to recede from any of her attempts at encroachment hitherto persisted in; but, on the contrary, it is commended as a treaty of peace because the consequences will otherwise be most disastrous, and this without regard to what we have conceded to obtain it. If this is not accepted, the continuance of Great Britain in these annoyances and aggravations more intense and more persistent are held up here as the result of a rejection of this treaty.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts kindly tell us who that has favored the ratification of this treaty has made any such argument as that? On the contrary, every one who has spoken in defense of this treaty and in favor of its ratification, as I know, has contended that there has been no concession, actual or intended, on the part of the United States for what has been obtained in the way of favorable interpretation of the treaty of 1818.

Mr. DAWES. Then, Mr. President, the Senator has misread his Secretary of State, and I have misread him and all those who have advocated the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. GRAY. I think you have.

Mr. DAWES. The Secretary of State says from beginning to end that it is a treaty of mutual concession, that he could not expect a treaty of peace with England, who had maintained a certain contention for seventy years, without conceding something on our side; and if the Senator will possess his soul in patience and my strength holds out, I will endeavor to show him what it is that the Secretary has conceded to avoid these results.

The disastrous consequences have been repeated over and over again here until war has been intimated to be the result of a persistence longer on the part of the United States in its contention with Great Britain that its construction of this treaty was wrong.

Sir, this method of commending this treaty is not satisfactory to me. I should rather hear, as I have said, some one hold up to us what has been gained or what is to be gained by this treaty of peace. I would like to know how many of the rights for which we have contended for seventy years are secured by this treaty and conceded to us. This idea of the terrible consequences that shall come out of our longer persistence in maintaining our contention against the unjustifiable claims of Great Britain has but one parallel that I know of on the records of Congress.

I remember on one occasion just such a demand set up as the justification of an attempt to obtain peace and silence. It was in the record of those dark and gloomy days of the session next preceding the inauguration of Lincoln, when, as early as January of that year, the Pensacola navy-yard was surrendered to demands not a whit less justifiable, not a whit less tenable in the eyes of the people of the United States than the demands to which this treaty is a surrender; and when a Government official, whose duty it was to guard and protect the navy-yards of the nation, was called before a committee of the House of Representatives and the inquiry made of him why he surrendered the Pensacola navy-yard without a blow, his answer was, like the answer of to-day, "It was the only way to preserve the peace."

Mr. GRAY. Of course the Senator knows no such answer has been made to-day.

Mr. DAWES. The only way to preserve the peace! "Why, sir," said he, "you have no idea of the extravagant demands that are made by those men down there upon us. If we had fired a gun or struck a blow there would have been, as certainly as we live, bloodshed;" and, with a pious aspect, he lifted up his hands and said, "I thank God that by a surrender of that navy-yard I have saved this nation from bloodshed." A sorry and spiritless—I will not say cowardly—parallel is in the exclamation, "We have obtained peace" to-day; "we have saved the people of this country from a continuance of the annoyances, the harassments of the past, but we do not stop to say whether we have gained anything."

As a treaty of peace, Mr. President, this treaty is an utter failure, and it is to that point I desire to confine, as near as may be, what I propose to say on this occasion. If we could forget the humiliating conditions, if we could pass over the strange and inexplicable manner in which it has been negotiated, and if we could shut our eyes to everything but the result, I venture to say that it is utterly impossible to defend this treaty as a treaty of peace. There can be no peace under it. Those who negotiated it on the one side and those who negotiated on the other, though for very different reasons, will find their dissatisfaction with it so increased that the occasions for strife will multiply on either side until, if it were the treaty to-day, not a twelvemonth would pass before by common consent we should wish it in our power to retrace our steps to the time before it was negotiated.

One reason why it can never be a treaty of peace is because it is not the treaty it pretends to be. In discussing the treaty under this head, it is pretty difficult for us to ascertain with very great clearness what the treaty does pretend to do, for it comes to us under circumstances and under a cover, the like of which has never occurred in my memory of public affairs, and, so far as I have been able to investigate, in the annals of American diplomacy. It was sprung upon the Senate. So far as the Senate was aware, the first knowledge it had of it was the message of the President conveying it to us and asking us to ratify it. We were in session, we knew that the general opinion and consensus of public men here at the Capitol proclaimed on both sides of this Chamber with clearness and distinctness and with the approval of almost the entire Chamber, was that there was no need of any treaty. The position was taken that all that was demanded of the British Government was to keep the treaty she had made.

It was known that the Senate, who must be the adviser of the President as to any treaty that can take effect, had publicly and officially declared against any commission for the negotiation of a treaty, and that was all we knew until we heard from Great Britain that Joseph Chamberlain had been appointed a commissioner to come over to this country and join a commission here for the negotiation of a new treaty. He came, he was here, there were others here, but the Senate knew nothing of them, and what they were doing the Senate was not informed. Whether they were treating of matters that pertained to the interests of any particular section of this country the Senate was totally ignorant, except as rumor in the newspapers kept them informed.

All of a sudden, as I have said, the treaty appeared here in the Senate, made by men in whose appointment we had no voice, whose selection was made without consulting us, and we very naturally, before we gave the advice to the President upon the propriety of this treaty, asked him to be good enough to inform his constitutional advisers of the several steps which led to this treaty, so that we could the better judge of the propriety of the treaty itself, and we were coolly informed that these negotiators, meeting with closed doors, self-appointed so far as we were concerned, had agreed among themselves that nobody should know these steps, not even the Senate which was to advise as to the wisdom of the result to which the several steps had led; that they had agreed that nobody should know what they were and that we should deal with the result, and the result alone, and take that or take nothing.

But it so happened, Mr. President, that the Canadian negotiator, when he came before the Canadian Parliament to justify his course in the negotiation, found it necessary, being a member of the Parliament and compelled to answer, to disclose what were the steps, so that those who sent him here could judge whether he was justified or not, and he adjourned the debate till he could telegraph to the British minister here to get from Mr. Bayard one of the propositions which he made preliminary to the result to which after several months he was induced to give his consent. When he got that which Mr. Bayard refused to let the Senate have, he came before the Canadian Parliament and made a reply to this statement of Mr. Bayard that they had agreed that nobody should know these steps.

I desire to put upon the record side by side the statement of Mr. Bayard that these men had agreed that nobody should know these steps, and the statement of Sir Charles Tupper upon the same subject, so that hereafter those who care to look into the diplomacy of this time shall have the material to make up a correct record. Mr. Bayard says:

> In conformity with the invariable course pursued in previous negotiations, when the conference met it was agreed that an honorable confidence should be maintained in its deliberations, and that only results should be announced, and such other matters as the joint protocolists should sign under the direction of the plenipotentiaries.
> With this understanding, which was strictly kept, the discussions of the conference proceeded, through its numerous and prolonged sessions, with that freedom and informality in the exchange of views which the nature of the negotiation required, and without which its progress would have been materially hampered and any agreement rendered very difficult of attainment. No stenographer was admitted to the conference, and no minutes or daily protocols were agreed upon and signed by the joint protocolists other than those already transmitted to the Senate.

Now, hear what Sir Charles Tupper says about it after he got, through the British minister, one of his proposals made in that negotiation, and was ready to go before his constituents and defend his course:

> I have explained to the house my great surprise at finding they did not give what I assumed that the purely formal protocols to which I assented would give, that is to say, all the proposals made, and the counter proposals and the replies on both sides. I assumed that the protocols would contain those.

Now, sir, it appears that the only parties who agreed to keep secret the several proposals were those that were engaged in this negotiation on the side of the United States. They for some reason agreed to keep secret their proposals and that was done, but there was no such agreement with the others. I leave these two statements to stand in the record side by side.

It is pretended that by this treaty the British Government has abandoned the headland theory. The President in his message says they have abandoned the headland theory. Mr. Bayard says they have surrendered the headland theory. I do not intend to indulge in language that can be construed as disrespectful to the high officials who make these statements. It is enough for me to express my amazement that anybody standing in the relation that these officials do to the Senate of the United States, should advise an approval of the act they are seeking and should make so bald a statement that in this treaty the British Government have either abandoned or surrendered the headland theory. On the other hand they sold it to us, and then went away and boasted that they had sold us a mess of pottage. I desire to put upon record the evidence, first, that it was a mess of pottage, and, next, that what I have said is that they sold it to us and then boasted of how much they got for it.

In presenting the fact that it was not a theory living, abiding, and maintained at all to-day, except as a technical theory by the Government of Great Britain, I am obliged to read what has been put into the RECORD by others before me, but they have put it in for a different purpose, and I desire to use it now for a purpose for which it has not been used heretofore according to my recollection. I quote from Sir Charles Tupper, to whom we have been compelled, in the studied silence of our own negotiators, to turn for what little information we have been able to obtain in reference to the steps that have led to this singular treaty. I want here publicly to return my thanks to Sir Charles Tupper for the obligations he has put the American people under for furnishing them the material to form a proper judgment of this work, which has been withheld from them by our own negotiators. He is as frank as he is bold and able. He is determined, whatever may be the effect upon this work here in this Senate, that the Canadian people shall know that he in all the steps taken was true to their traditions and to their policy, and he says to the Canadian parliament:

The Americans have maintained that what we termed our exclusive right to shut them out of all bays was not well founded in the treaty. They have maintained that they had an indefeasible right under that treaty to approach within 3 miles of the shore of any bay or indentation.

My honorable friend shakes his head—

That was Mr. Mitchell—

but I hold in my hand authorities, and I could give them to him by the score, in which they have again and again maintained that position and demanded that right.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did not Great Britain for forty years enforce her construction of that treaty of 1818?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that nobody knows better than my honorable friend that Great Britain induced him to recall his regulations and instructions, after he had issued them, and restricted his jurisdiction, to within 3 miles of the shore.

Mr. MITCHELL. And why? Because Great Britain could control the Government of this country, and I had to do it; that is why.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Never mind, my honorable friend's inquiry was as to the position of Great Britain, and I give it to him. Great Britain has always contended, and has rightly contended, for technical exclusion from any bay, and the crown officers of England have sustained that contention. But my honorable friend knows that it is one thing to hold a technical construction, and it is another to undertake to enforce it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the honorable gentleman let me put one question to him? He states that Great Britain has held a technical construction of the treaty of 1818. I would say that Great Britain has actually enforced her technical construction for forty years. And with reference to what the honorable gentleman says about exclusion from bays, the first decision—and with reference to what the honorable gentleman says about exclusion from bays, the first decision was given in reference to the Bay of Fundy, where the headland on one side was American and the headland on the other was Canadian or Nova Scotian. That was the first give away of our treaty rights.

The attention of the Senator from Delaware may be attracted by this—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My honorable friend then means that for the first forty years Great Britain held a particular view which she has abandoned for the last forty years.

You will observe, Mr. President, with how much more ability the case of the Washington is argued in this Senate Chamber than it is before the Canadian Parliament.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not mean that. I will say what I mean if the honorable gentleman will let me. I say that for the first forty years Great Britain legitimately enforced that contention and the Americans recognized it. Under the decision in the case of the Bay of Fundy, one side of which was American and the other side Nova Scotian, it was held that bay was not exclusively an English bay, and upon the decision in that case our rights were given away and suspended by England, and were not enforced as strictly as they had been before.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, I do not intend to be drawn into a discussion by my honorable friend, because I do not question very much his statement; but I want to ask him whether he thinks a right which is technically claimed but practically abandoned for forty years, is gaining in strength. I take a different view.

Then he goes on to quote authorities which have been already read here, and I will take no time to repeat them, authorities sustaining the statement that Great Britain, without formally giving up, had abandoned the headland theory, and which led Sir Charles Tupper to say "practically that what was done in the Bay of Fundy was to be the rule," and quotes Mr. Everett, who was our minister at the time that case arose, as saying:

Mr. Everett thought that the negotiations were now in a most favorable state That is—after the Bay of Fundy was given up Mr. Everett thought that the negotiations were in a most favorable state for a full and satisfactory adjustment of the dispute.

Mr. Everett "had the fullest assurance"—

Sir Charles Tupper is quoting him—that the British Government contemplated a further extension of the same policy by the adoption of a general regulation that American fishermen should be allowed freely to enter all bays of which the mouths were not more than 6 miles in width.

And the home government thereupon, in 1870, by special instructions, which I shall put in, directed the then Government of Canada to permit a fishing vessel to go anywhere in all the waters of the northern coast except within 3 miles of the shore.

The instructions are as follows:

DISPATCH FROM HOME GOVERNMENT TO CANADA, JUNE 6, 1870.

With those objects, they think it advisable that United States fishermen should not be excluded from any waters except within 3 miles from the shore, or in the unusual case of a bay which is less than 6 miles wide at its mouth but spreads to a greater width within. It will, of course, be understood and explained to the United States Government that this liberty is conceded temporarily and without prejudice to the rights of Great Britain to fall back on her treaty rights, if the prospect of an arrangement lessens, or if the concession is found to interfere practically with the protection of the Canadian fisheries.

All this Sir Charles Tupper puts in support of this declaration:

I think I have satisfied my honorable friend that, as far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned, while they maintained the abstract right under the treaty, they were unwilling to raise the question of bays, and the result is, as my honorable friend knows, that for the last thirty-four years, certainly since 1854—and I will not go further back than 1854—there has been no practical interference with American fishing vessels unless they were within 3 miles of the shore, in bays or elsewhere.

This was the statement to the Canadian Parliament of what was the condition of the headland theory when these negotiators met. If there has been anything in American politics which could justly be said to have fallen into "innocuous desuetude" it is this headland theory, and nobody can doubt that a spirited stand in any negotiation touching the treaty difficulties and misunderstandings between this Government and Great Britain on the part of our negotiators would have brought at once its public renunciation. Yet, sir, instead of that, what was done?

Sir Charles Tupper, with the frankness which I have had occasion to commend, tells us what was done with this headland theory.

Mr. GRAY. Give us the date of that.

Mr. DAWES. This is the speech of Sir Charles Tupper in the Canadian Parliament, April 10, 1888.

I say, when we met these gentlemen and they proposed to us this 10-mile limit—

Instead of attempting to recover what we lost in the unfortunate treaty of 1818, instead of an effort to regain anything, the first thing that the American negotiators did was to extend the 3-mile limit to 5.

I say, when we met these gentlemen and they proposed to us this 10-mile limit and said "if you give up the extreme contention that no bay, however broad its mouth, can be entered by an American fisherman, we will agree to take the 10-mile limit," and when they met us further and said that in addition to that they would take up and consider the question of any special bays we thought ought not to be open to foreigners, then we took this question up, as we were bound to take it up, and found a solution by mutual concession. Instead of giving in to their contention that they could go into the Baie des Chaleurs within 3 miles of the shore we made a treaty by which they can not enter the Baie des Chaleurs at all. And the honorable gentleman knows that the Miramichi Bay and a number of other bays that we consider of vital importance to be kept free from any kind of intrusion have been conceded to us.

When we accepted this 10-mile delimitation, which was all that appears to have been aimed at by any Canadian Government, the extreme limit that any person had proposed as a matter of delimitation, we made it a condition of the acceptance of that restriction that certain bays should be exempt from its operation.

What is the consequence, Mr. President? Here are bays; look at the Bay of Chaleurs [indicating on the map], 16 miles across, from which we absolutely are excluded by this treaty. They have no claim at all to exclude us from the Bay of Chaleurs, except by the headland theory, and they have either had conceded to them that to which they had no right whatever or they have had established the headland theory so far as that bay is concerned. So of the Bay of Egmont, 17½ miles across. Nothing but the headland theory ever gave them any exclusive claim in the Bay of Egmont, and if they have by this treaty exclusive right there it is because they have revived the dead headland theory. So of Miramichi Bay, which is 14½ miles wide.

It is proposed by this treaty to exclude us absolutely from that bay. They have never had any claim to exclude us absolutely from it except by the headland theory, and by the headland theory revived, voluntarily offered by our commissioners, we are to be excluded absolutely from it. So of Fortune Bay, which is 11½ miles and 10⅞ miles—over 21 miles across. Just look how that is measured [indicating] running like the letter V so as to strike an island which would be excluded absolutely if it had run straight across. They never had a right to exclude us from Fortune Bay, except under the doctrine of the headland theory; and yet our commissioners have negotiated and voluntarily yielded the headland theory to the exclusion of Fortune Bay, and so with the other bays. Methinks that if I had been one of the negotiators, Fortune Bay, the scene of the last and almost only brilliant achievement of our diplomacy in those waters, would have been the last to be given up to the exclusive occupation of those from whom one spirited stand at least of one of our diplomats wrung from England justice to us in that bay. But, no; all of these bays 10, 15, 16, 17 miles across, in which they never asserted any right except under the headland theory, are given up to their exclusive occupation.

Mr. GRAY rose.

Mr. DAWES. The Bay of Chaleurs, which by name——

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator object to my interrupting him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. DAWES. In one minute. The Bay of Chaleurs; there is one other, which by express order of the home government, the Canadian authorities were forbidden to hinder our fishing in, which has gone into this negotiation and been sold to the British Government.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator says that the Bay of Chaleurs, the Bay of Miramichi, the Bay of Egmont, and all those bays which he indicated on the map, had been claimed by Canada on the headland theory. I do not exactly understand what he means by "headland theory." If he has an interpretation in regard to that theory which admits of a remark like that, we differ entirely as to what the headland theory is.

But I wish to ask the attention of the Senator to the language of the specification in the treaty of 1818. We renounced the right to take or cure fish within 3 miles of the bays of His British Majesty's dominion, and the bays of Chaleurs, Miramichi, and Egmont, and all the bays he has indicated, are bays nominatim, are known as bays and come under that classification, and, therefore, come within the word and letter, to use the language of the Senator just now, of the treaty of 1818, and we are excluded by the treaty of 1818, not upon any headland theory, but by the express language of that treaty, the letter of our bond, to use the expression of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I promised the Senator, as well as I might be able, that I should talk to the point that this was not a treaty of peace and that I would not vex the Senate with any discussion of the meaning of terms, but I read what the home government instructed the Canadian Government in respect to their bays and such bays eo nomine, to use the Senator's phrase:

Until further instructed, therefore, you will not interfere with any American fishermen unless found within 3 miles of the shore, or within 3 miles of a line drawn across the mouth of a bay or creek which, though in parts more than 6 miles wide, is less than 6 geographical miles in width at its mouth. In the case of any other bay—at Bay des Chaleurs, for example—you will not interfere with any United States fishing vessel or boat, or any American fishermen, unless they are found within 3 miles of the shore.

My argument is that the British Government had for forty years determined not to exclude American fishermen from any waters that were not within 3 miles of the shore.

Mr. HOAR. My colleague will permit me to make one suggestion there, which I know has not escaped his knowledge, for he knows it as well as I do, but which I would like to have him state at this point.

Not only is this the concession of Sir Charles Tupper in regard to the practice and demands of the British Government for the last forty years, but Mr. Rush, who was our minister to England at the time of the treaty of 1818 and for several years thereafter, Mr. Stevenson, who soon followed him, and Mr. Marcy, our Secretary of State, all averred that England made no such claim for the first forty years after the treaty of 1818. The claim was never heard of in all that time; so you have the entire period from 1818 down to the present time—a period of seventy years—with the single exception of the seizures of the Argus and the Washington, where we had the judgment of the British Government absolutely renouncing this claim.

Mr. DAWES. I am obliged to my colleague for the suggestion. I know that the claim was only technical all the time and never enforced, but what my colleague says is a very strong aid to the argument I have been making.

Now, I want to call back the attention of the Senate to what was done with this headland theory, with this 3-mile limit, and all that. It came from our negotiators; it was a voluntary concession, not asked for by the other side, if there is any truth in the statement of Sir Charles Tupper, who said:

I say when we met these gentlemen and they proposed to us this 10-mile limit, and said: "If you give up the extreme contention that no bay, however broad its mouth, can be entered by an American fisherman we will agree to take the 10-mile limit;" and when they met us further and said that in addition to that they would take up and consider the question of any special bays we thought ought not to be open to foreigners, then we took this question up, as we were bound to take it up, and found a solution by mutual concession. Instead of giving in to their contention that they could go into the Baie des Chaleurs within 3 miles of the shore, we made a treaty by which they can not enter the Baie des Chaleurs at all.

Then he turns around to Mr. Mitchell and says:

And the honorable gentleman knows that the Miramichi Bay, and a number of other bays that we consider of vital importance to be kept free from any kind of intrusion, have been conceded to us.

And for what? For this old, defunct claim of the headland theory and for a voluntary extension of the 3-mile limit to 5 miles! I do not know that I wonder at a desire to keep from the knowledge of the Senate any of the steps which led up to the result.

The President of the United States, in communicating this treaty to us, said:

The uninterrupted navigation of the Strait of Canso is expressly and for the first time affirmed.

I want to read this once more because there is in it much for comment.

The uninterrupted navigation of the Strait of Canso is expressly and for the first time affirmed.

Permit me to say that it is no such thing. The language of the treaty is this (mark the difference between it and the language of the President):

Nothing in this treaty shall interrupt or affect the free navigation of the Strait of Canso by fishing vessels of the United States.

That is all. Does it mean that no other vessels of the United States can be permitted to navigate the Straits of Canso? Is it proposed by this treaty that whenever a merchant vessel of the United States shall pass the Straits of Canso it must get leave of Great Britain? Does the merchant vessel that passes the Straits of Gibraltar stop and get leave of Great Britain, or does the merchant vessel that passes the Straits of Magellan stop and get permission of Great Britain that it may navigate those waters?

Yet Sir Charles Tupper says expressly to the Canadian Parliament that—

They confined it to fishing vessels.

We provided simply that nothing in this treaty should interrupt the free navigation of the Straits of Canso, as previously enjoyed by fishing vessels to which we confined it.

I have said that I am not to vote for a treaty in this day the phraseology of which is open to honest debate in an American Senate. Who is right as to the construction of this clause in reference to the Straits of Canso, the President of the United States, who says that it secures the free navigation of those straits, or Sir Charles Tupper, who says it is confined, as the treaty says it is, to fishing vessels that enjoyed it before?

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask whether he has any amendments that he proposes to offer to this treaty so as to make the language satisfactory to himself? If there is any obscurity or doubt about any feature of it, it is now amendable, and I would like to know whether the Senator is under any obligation not to make any amendment?

Mr. DAWES. I am under no obligation not to make an amendment of a treaty which, in my opinion, is not a treaty of peace, but a treaty full of strife, and contention, and disorder, and disturbance.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state to the Senator that it is quite easy, if there is any difficulty about that matter, to have an amendment to that or any other clause in the treaty to suit the views of the Senator, as we are now negotiating this treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. DAWES. I know the Senator owes me no ill will; but I do not see why the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Alabama are so determined to draw me off the track.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon; I want to draw him on the track.

Mr. DAWES. After all, Mr. President, it is neither the one nor the other. This treaty does not, as the President seems to think it does, affirm the free navigation of the Straits of Canso. It says that nothing in the treaty shall be construed to interfere with the passage by fishing vessels there. If I own a tract of land across which the king's highway has run, and all the king's subjects have traveled thereon from a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and I convey it to you and I put into the deed "that nothing in this deed shall be construed to interfere with the right of the king's subjects to travel to and fro upon and along the king's highway across this tract of land," I might as well say to you, "Sir, I have granted you this, and I have secured to the king's subjects a right they never had before." The absurdity of the claim when all vessels from time immemorial had passed unobjected to through the Straits of Canso, that because they shut up one end of it and said that shutting up that end should not interfere with the passage of these straits, therefore the right to pass these Straits had been obtained from Great Britain!

Great Britain never since the Declaration of Independence had the power to interfere with the free passage of the Straits of Canso by any vessels of the United States. The encroachments upon the letter of the treaty of 1818 are not more visible than they are in this very thing. The treaty of 1818 does not exclude fishing vessels from going within 3 miles of the shore; it only prohibits them from fishing within 3 miles of the shore, and there was nothing in the treaty of 1818 that prevented a fishing vessel from going within 3 miles of any shore or from going through the Straits of Canso, provided they did not fish in the Straits of Canso or within 3 miles of the shore; and yet it is among the pretenses upon which we are asked to approve of this treaty that something valuable has been conceded to us by Great Britain in this exception in relation to the Straits of Canso.

Now, sir, I propose briefly to allude to those articles of the treaty which are held up here as commendable because they provide for an amelioration of the administration of justice in the colonies. I have to say in reference to them what Sir Charles Tupper himself confessed in the Canadian Parliament, that every one of them was no more nor less than what was due to good neighborhood. Are we, sir, to negotiate with Great Britain and buy good neighborhood? Have we spirit enough to resent the proposition, if it should come to us, "If you will give us so much we will be decent in our courts?" Have we not spirit enough to say, "We do not treat with you for fair dealing in your courts. If you are disposed to deny it to us, we will hold you up to the judgment of mankind and we will bide our time." "Everything that is right comes to him who waits."

I will not take up much time in reading the comments on these clauses made by the Canadian negotiator when he was trying to satisfy the Canadian Parliament that what he had conceded did not amount to much. It is all summed up in this phrase:

A provision—

Said he—

that she may obtain casual and needful supplies of that kind was demanded in the interests of good neighborhood, and it was not going too far to say that we would allow them to enjoy those advantages.

But, sir, of what worth is it all to us so long as there is a provision in this treaty that subjects it all to the local laws? We are to enjoy whatever we enjoy in reference to these provisions ameliorating the administration of justice there, subject to such rules and regulations as shall hereafter be made. It is not worth as a security the paper that it is written on. We are subject, if the treaty is ratified, to the caprice, to the prejudice, to the hostility of local legislation. Already, sir, since this debate has begun an instance of it has occurred illustrating the emptiness of all this provision.

One of our fishing vessels has taken out a license under the modus vivendi, which authorized the captain to purchase bait, and he purchased bait, and in a Newfoundland harbor divided his bait with a

French fishing vessel and was immediately prosecuted for violation of a local law that forbade the selling of bait to foreigners. They might to-morrow determine that there should be only so much bait purchased, and we have agreed to conform to it. They might to-morrow pass a local law in Newfoundland, or in Nova Scotia, or in the Dominion, that bait should only be purchased within certain periods of close season, as it is called, and we are bound to submit, and we are asked by American negotiators to surrender what I have stated, and to accept this among the concessions. In reference to it I would like to have the Senate take note of what Sir Charles Tupper says of the idea of submitting to the local law:

I am glad to know that Mr. Bayard had too much respect for the people of Canada—and he has since learned in the most conclusive manner that his views were well founded—to come to any other conclusion than that no Canadian would ever consent to be legislated for by any other country in the world.

But we are asked to submit our rights pertaining to the fishing in these waters, that we once enjoyed as the price of our blood and valor, to the local law of Canada and the Provinces.

There is one more reason why I think this can never be a treaty of peace. The reciprocity treaty of 1854 admitted free of duty "fish of all kinds, products of fish, and all other creatures living in the water, being the growth and produce of the said Provinces of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island," and after that, Newfoundland.

The treaty of 1871 admitted free of duty fish-oil and fish of all kinds (except the fish of the inland lakes and of the rivers falling into them, and except fish preserved in oil) being the produce of the fisheries of the Dominion of Canada or of Prince Edward's Island.

The present treaty proposes that when we admit free of duty fish-oil, whale-oil, seal-oil, and fish of all kinds (except fish preserved in oil) being the produce of the fisheries—mark the difference—carried on by the fishermen of Canada, Newfoundland, and Labrador, wherever carried on, we shall receive the privilege of entering the ports, bays, and harbors of Canada and Newfoundland for these three purposes:

1. The purchase of provisions, bait, ice, seines, lines, and all other supplies and outfits.
2. Transshipment of catch, for transport by any means of conveyance.
3. Shipping of crews.

How came this difference to creep into the treaty? The other treaties confined free fish to the fisheries the produce of the Dominion. In this treaty it is provided that the produce of the fisheries, of the fishermen of Canada, wherever those fisheries may be, are to be admitted; and put alongside of it are two other things in this treaty for the first time, "whale-oil" and "seal-oil."

How came whale-oil and seal-oil to be inserted for the first time in this treaty? When the treaties of 1854 and 1871 were negotiated, whale-oil and seal-oil had almost passed out of the pursuits of fishermen. There was no product of whale-oil or seal-oil at that time. But since then the whales of the Northern Pacific have yielded wonderful and marvelous products to the daring fishermen of the United States, and seal on that coast are coming to enter into the pursuits of most of the enterprising fishermen of the country. Here the provision creeps for the first time into this treaty, that the Canadians shall be permitted to bring whale-oil and seal-oil free of duty into our markets.

They are looking to the Northern Pacific. They are looking to the wealth that is there in those cold ocean inlets, where the whale is coming to be abundant, and they are providing that the fishermen of Canada shall side by side with our fishermen bring them into the ports of Portland and San Francisco free of duty; and whenever seal-oil shall come to be a valuable article of merchandise they are to bring it in free of duty. Whenever the time shall come that this provision shall develop, if it becomes a treaty, into the full significance of those words, then it will be found, if not before, that the treaty will cease to be a treaty of peace.

But, sir, the treaty will fail utterly as a treaty of peace for another reason. Canada herself has failed of obtaining that for which she entered into this negotiation, and she will not rest till she has obtained it. She is boasting, it is true, of what she has got so far as the fisheries are concerned, like the man who whistles while he passes through a graveyard; but the people of Canada will find no consolation or satisfaction when they come to consider also that they have utterly failed in that for which they entered into the negotiation. Sir Charles Tupper has stated in the Canadian Parliament that he is responsible for this negotiation. He said:

In regard to my position in that conference, I have already shown the House how largely I am responsible for what has taken place. The conference was initiated from the interview which took place between myself and Mr. Bayard. I was subsequently asked to serve as one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries on that important mission.

I think Sir Charles Tupper is mistaken in imagining that he initiated this negotiation. However large a share he had in the negotiation and management, and however largely his impress from beginning to end is left upon the whole transaction, nevertheless there was another official here before him. Somehow it came to be understood simultaneously in the different parts of the British dominions on our north, and among all those interested in British dominion on our north, that the accession of the present Administration to power was their opportunity. It was not that they had any grievance about the fisheries. No, they were the last people to complain of their own outrages in the matter of the fisheries; but simultaneously, I say, it came to be understood that the accession of the present Administration to power was Canada's opportunity. Sir Ambrose Shea, an official of the Government of Newfoundland, was on his way to this capital, if not simultaneously with the inauguration, almost immediately upon it, confessedly for the purpose of instituting commercial negotiations on account of his own province alone, under cover of fisheries difficulties. He made no secret on his way here of his errand. He talked with whomsoever he came in contact about the purpose. He came here and was introduced to this Administration by the British minister.

About the same time Mr. Wiman, a Canadian, whose residence is in Brooklyn, a man of large enterprise and efficiency and executive ability, devoted entirely to the expansion of commercial relations between the Dominion of Canada and this country, appeared here and had a conversation with the Secretary of State. Thereupon Mr. West, the British minister, took the matter up and proposed, what has been so often read here, the proposition by which a temporary arrangement would be made, provided the President of the United States would recommend to Congress a commission for the purpose, under the cover of the fishery difficulties, of arranging commercial relations with Canada. Mr. Wiman went to Canada after this interview and had an interview with Sir Charles Tupper, and Sir Charles Tupper's account of it I will read:

I do not know that the speech I made had any connection with it; but I know this, that a mutual friend—I have no objection to mentioning that it was Mr. Wiman—at an early day after this speech was delivered intimated to me that he had had a long conversation with the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Bayard, and that that gentleman had said that he would be very glad to have an opportunity of discussing the mutual relations of Canada and the United States with either my right honorable friend the premier of Canada or myself. I brought that statement under the notice of his excellency the governor-general and my right honorable friend; and as it was quite impossible for him to leave his place in parliament at that time I took advantage of the Easter holidays to accept this formal invitation. I went down to Washington and was presented to Mr. Bayard by Her Majesty's minister there.

Then Sir Charles Tupper went home, and Mr. Bayard wrote him a letter:

Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper.

[Personal and unofficial.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 31, 1887.

MY DEAR SIR CHARLES: The delay in writing you has been unavoidable.

After saying some other things, he proceeded:

It is evident that the commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of Canada and those of the United States has grown into too vast proportion to be exposed much longer to this wordy triangular duel, and more direct and responsible methods should be resorted to.

* * * * * * *

The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, which has been questio vexata ever since it was concluded, and to-day is suffered to interfere with and seriously embarrass the good understanding of both countries in the important commercial relations and interests which have come into being since its ratification, and for the adjustment of which it is wholly inadequate, as has been unhappily proved by the events of the past two years.

I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement, and there is but one way to procure it, and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries.

* * * * * * *

T. F. BAYARD.

Sir Charles Tupper immediately answered:

* * * * * * *

I entirely concur in your statement that "We both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement, and that there is but one way to procure it, and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesman-like plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries.

Thereupon Lord Salisbury immediately telegraphed Minister West:

If Secretary of State will formally propose the appointment of commission as suggested by him in his correspondence with Sir Charles Tupper, Her Majesty's Government will agree with great pleasure.

SALISBURY.

Some time after this, July 12, 1887, in a letter to Mr. Phelps, Mr. Bayard emphasizes the clear understanding of the parties to this negotiation in the outset, that it was commercial privileges for Canadians in our market, to be secured under cover of negotiations over the fisheries, and in the same letter he explains why he, without communication with the other side, abandoned the original purpose of the negotiation:

I delayed my response to Mr. White's dispatch of March 30, and on May 21 Sir Charles Tupper, the Canadian minister of finance, called upon me at this Department, introduced by the British minister at this capital.

The object of this visit was to discuss informally the present condition and prospects of commercial relations between the United States and the Dominion of Canada, especially in connection with the fisheries and the commercial questions involved.

The visit here of Sir Charles Tupper, on behalf of the Canadian Government, was received with cordiality, and expressions were exchanged of a mutual desire for the settlement of all existing difficulties, and for an increased freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada.

In consequence of the statements made by Sir Charles Tupper on the occasion referred to, I wrote to him a personal and unofficial letter on the 31st of May, and received on June 10 his reply, and copies of this correspondence were duly sent to you.

Then he explains why he abandoned it:

By reason of the action of the Senate on April 15, 1886, in regard to the recommendation of the President for the appointment of a joint commission to take into consideration the entire question of fishing rights of the two Governments and their citizens on the coast of British North America, the formation of a joint commission was not again proposed by me, but in the discharge of his constitutional functions negotiations with a view to a settlement were not abandoned, but have been proceeded with by this Department under the direction of the President.

Without anything to do with the Senate. These were the purposes. I have omitted to read, what will be found in these letters, that Sir Lionel West demanded of Mr. Bayard and received an explicit interpretation of the arrangement entered into by them, that it included commercial relations. Sir Charles Tupper said:

I can only say, sir, that when I came to meet them in conference, I was greatly surprised, and you will not be surprised to learn that such was the case after reading the papers I shall read with reference to commercial intercourse. After the statement of the President of the United States in his message of 1885, asking for a commission, after the letters which passed between Mr. Bayard and myself, you will readily understand that I went there.

Senators who want to know what Sir Charles Tupper came here for in this negotiation will listen to his own statement.

I went there expecting and looking forward to a settlement of this question on very much the same lines as those upon which it had been settled in 1854, and to some extent in 1871. I am right in saying that the instructions with which I was charged by this Government were to obtain, if it were possible, as near an approach to the reciprocity treaty of 1854 as I could obtain; that is, the policy of carrying out free exchange in the natural products of the countries.

And the very first proposition made by him when the negotiators met, that proposition which he found it absolutely necessary to get hold of before he went before his constituents for justification, was in these words:

That with the view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries, that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the fisheries articles of the Washington treaty, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland.

Commissioner Angell in the quiet retreat of his university at home in Michigan, not having the fear of the Secretary of State before his eyes, has been telling what they did. He said:

We were a long time getting down to the real work of the commission, all the parties interested were so varied. The British and Canadian commissioners were especially anxious to make a reciprocal free-trade treaty a part of the treaty before they would settle on the fishery question. More than one-half the time was occupied in this manner. The real work has been done within the last month.

Can there be any doubt that Canada has failed of her purpose in entering into this negotiation, and that that purpose, paramount to any fishery question, still remains as a persistent, an abiding, and a moving policy of Canada, while they may, to break the force of their failure, claim that they sold out their old idea of headland theory, and got the 3-mile limit extended to 5 miles, and got us shut out of valuable bays that we were never really shut out of before, and did a capital thing under the fishery clause? Yet what is all that so long as Mordecai sits at the king's gate? "Unless we can have the markets of the United States, all we have done goes for naught. What boots it to us whether the American fishermen shall fish in the Bay of Chaleurs or not, if we can not take our fish into their market when we have obtained them; all goes for naught unless we obtain this."

Sir, not less Canada than the United States will find this treaty not a treaty of peace with the United States, because it is a pusillanimous surrender by us of valuable rights, and because, though the Canadians have obtained concessions, yet in the greater and the larger object for the attainment of which they used this only as an instrument they have utterly failed.

One thing more I omitted as a reason why we should never approve this treaty, that I should like some one to tell me what the twelfth article means.

ARTICLE XII.

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coast of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to the United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

On all "the Atlantic coast of the United States." What those rights will be, what will be exacted under this head of the treaty, I have heard no friend of the treaty expound. It is a significant fact that when Sir Charles Tupper expounded the treaty section by section to the Canadian parliament for their approval he expounded article 11, and skipped to article 13, an ominous silence which can only be interpreted that there was nothing in it worth commenting on or too much to expose to the American Senate.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator mind reading the twelfth article? I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. DAWES. It is as follows:

Fishing vessels of Canada and Newfoundland shall have on the Atlantic coast of the United States all the privileges reserved and secured by this treaty to United States fishing vessels in the aforesaid waters of Canada and Newfoundland.

Mr. GRAY. Has the Senator from Massachusetts any real doubt as to what that means? I will ask him that, if it is a fair question.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator from Massachusetts, in his ignorance of the diplomacy of the present day as to what it means and what it does not mean, will confess that he can not tell what will be claimed by the fishing vessels of Canada under that article of the treaty.

Mr. GRAY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator or detain him, because he has expressed a desire not to be interrupted——

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will excuse me.

Mr. GRAY. But I will ask him, if he has any real doubt, whether he ought not, in behalf of the interests involved, to offer an amendment to make clear what he says is obscure?

Mr. DAWES. When I am invited into the councils of these negotiators and not told that it is none of my business what were the steps which led to this result, I shall consider the proposition made by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. Are we not negotiators ourselves under the Constitution?

Mr. DAWES. Then I should like to know why we are not permitted to see and hear what has been done up to this time in the negotiation.

Mr. GRAY. We have been permitted to see and hear all that has been done.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, and we are indebted to Sir Charles Tupper in the Canadian parliament for it, in the face of an absolute refusal by our own Secretary of State to give us anything except the result. We have got into it pretty thoroughly, and I repeat the obligations of the American people to that foreign negotiator for the benefit of it.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator object to my interrupting him further?

Mr. DAWES. He does somewhat.

Mr. GRAY. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. As the negotiation was undertaken on our part for one thing, and on their part for another, neither of which has been accomplished, upon what ground does anybody expect that a ratification would compose the difficulties that exist under the treaty of 1818?

What was our complaint, sir? Why did the American people demand that there should be any effort on the part of this Administration to obtain redress? It was not because of the 3-mile limit. That, as I have said, was in the bond. Hard as it was, the universal judgment of those whom it affected was, "We will abide by it." It was not because the headland theory had troubled us. That had passed among the things that were. It was because the people of Canada did not observe the treaty Great Britain had made, because they had instituted a system of annoying and harassing us, and committing injuries upon our vessels, and we demanded of the Administration that they should see to it that two things were brought about—that the British Government should keep the treaty they had made, and should make compensation for the damages that they had committed in violation of it. That was all that those affected by the treaty ever demanded of the Government. It is quite as much and a little more than they can hope to obtain from the Government until after the 4th of March.

Yet, two or three long years has the Secretary of State been employed in pronouncing those outrages brutal and inhuman and unjustifiable, and when he was driven into a negotiation by the Canadian government, driven, however, for another purpose, he abandoned altogether the claims for compensation, abandoned the demand that they should adhere to the 3-mile limit, abandoned any complaint for the insult to the flag of the country, and contented himself with this treaty, which deals with subjects that to any American cognizant of the manner in which the rights he gave away were obtained is looked upon with the utmost concern and indignation.

But what does he say is the reason why he did not insist upon the damages? In his interview in the Baltimore Sun he tells us why he gave them up, and I should like to have the men upon whom these outrages were committed hear what has become of their claims. He said:

Every point submitted to the conference is covered by the paper now in possession of the Senate, excepting the question of damages sustained by our fishermen, which, being met by the counter claim for damages to British vessels in Behring Sea, was left for future settlement. This was determined the best course that could be pursued by the commission. As their claim exceeded ours, I was very willing to agree to this.

He was willing to give up the claims for damages for the outrages upon two thousand fishing vessels of the United States, and cease to press them because in answer Great Britain set up a bigger claim.

Mr. HOAR. If we have done England such injustice as that we want to meet it and settle at once.

Mr. DAWES. Will the claim be any the less that Great Britain sets up about Behring Sea to-morrow than it was yesterday? If to set up a bigger claim can drive us off once, will they lack the temptation or the ability to set it up again? When will the time come, according to this standard, that we can insist upon our just claims being adjusted, claims which Mr. Bayard himself has pronounced just? Oh, some time when Great Britain will not set up a bigger claim!

If Great Britain has a claim against us in Behring Sea it is quite time we knew what it is, and if it is founded in justice and law, we will pay it. It is no answer to these claims that England pretends to have a bigger one somewhere else. Let her bring forward her claims in Behring Sea, and whatever may be their justice or their amount they will be met according to the law and the right, and paid if due. But the demands upon England for the outrages committed on our fishing vessels, in present hands, under present diplomatic policy, have gone never, so long as such a reason as this is to be deemed valid, to return.

In the interview published in the Baltimore Sun, Mr. Bayard speaks of another thing which perhaps was dwelt on sufficiently by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] on Saturday afternoon, but still I can not omit calling attention to it once more. I desire that my constituents shall see and know what is the estimate put by this Administration upon the American flag when it floats at the mast-head of a fishing schooner. I want them to know what this Administration considers a full apology when a British officer tears down on the deck of a fishing schooner in the presence of its master the flag of his country and casts it at his feet. Mr. Bayard says:

Again he charges—

That is, my wicked colleague—

Again he charges that I allowed the flag of an American vessel to be hauled down by the officers of a British cruiser. For that act this country received a full apology from England. As much can not be said when indignities were heaped upon American seamen in years gone by.

Mr. Bayard says, in a letter in reference to this subject to Mr. Phelps November 6, 1886:

Under the fourteenth section of the twentieth chapter of the Navy Regulations of the United States the rule in such cases is laid down as follows:
"A neutral vessel seized is to wear the flag of her own country until she is adjudged to be a lawful prize by a competent court."

He made demand for an apology for this insult to our flag. He communicated the law to the British Government that the flag had a right to float at the mast-head until after the condemnation.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will indulge me a moment, I know he will be satisfied to do so when I tell him for what purpose I ask leave to interrupt him. He alluded to an interview purporting to have been had with Mr. Bayard, published in the Baltimore Sun. I think that was the paper. I see that it was alluded to on Saturday by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. Of course, neither the Senator from Colorado nor the Senator from Massachusetts was aware that Mr. Bayard disavowed that interview, that he said it was unauthorized, and did not truly represent him. I, of course, know that the Senator would desire that Mr. Bayard should have the opportunity through me of stating what I have said of that statement in the Sun, and that is all I wish to say.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that this is the first time I have ever heard of a disavowal. It has been a matter of discussion in the Senate, privately at least, ever since its appearance, and this is the first intimation that I have ever had that it was disavowed.

Mr. GRAY. I said I presumed that it was the first intimation the Senator from Colorado had had, otherwise he would not have alluded to an interview which the party interviewed disavowed.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware, with my colleague's permission, as it is somewhat interesting, whether the Senator from Delaware is authorized by Mr. Bayard to disavow it?

Mr. GRAY. No; I have had no direct authorization; but I saw the disavowal published in the Baltimore Sun.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps my colleague will allow me to say (as that interview contains a good deal of reference to me, I should not have alluded to it at all anywhere in public if it had not been alluded to by others first in the Senate), that I read it with profoundest pity, with no other sensation. The misstatements, the anger, the feeble and impotent rage which somebody has imputed to a high officer of our Government could only make any patriotic American citizen experience a sensation of mortification and not of anger. If that interview be true, the Secretary of State has learned nothing in relation to the fishing interest except the language of the fish market, and that the language of the London fish market. I am very glad that there is a report somewhere that the Secretary of State has disavowed it.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat could not forego the opportunity, I suppose, of expressing himself in regard to this purported interview, inasmuch as it alluded to himself, but after what I have stated, that the interview was unauthorized by Mr. Bayard, and that it was so stated in the paper, and from the same source from which the interview came, I think all that he said was very much out of place, and I do not understand what the sense of propriety is which will allow any Senator to comment upon language imputed to another which he disavows himself.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that the word "unauthorized" contains a disavowal.

Mr. GRAY. Whatever the Senator understands, such is the publication in the paper coming from the same source from which the purported interview came.

Mr. HOAR. There is no contradiction. There is no statement that the Secretary of State did not utter it.

Mr. GRAY. I am content. Among those with whom I have associated such a disavowal is always sufficient.

Mr. DAWES. I am sorry this interlude got into my speech. Does the Senator from Delaware think I do not know why men sometimes choose interviews rather than communications to the public over their own signatures? Has the public become acquainted with this new method of getting one's views before the public and not know why it has superseded the open and frank and unreserved communication over one's own signature? I assume that the Senator is correct, that this got out without the authority of the Secretary of State, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. FRYE. It is no worse than the Boston Herald interview.

Mr. DAWES. If there were words to be disavowed they should be disavowed to the man they affected, and not in a way to arm another with the material the moment they are commented on here to get up with the remarkable assertion that the statement got out without authority. I would like to ask the Senator from Delaware if he means by his remarks to assert that the Secretary of State never said anywhere that England had made a full apology for this insult upon the flag? If that is so I am sorry for him. I am not sorry that he has not said that it was a full apology, but I am sorry that he had not said something about this apology if he takes back this.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Massachusetts asks me a question, and I suppose he will permit me to reply. I was not listening to what the Senator said about the matter to which he has just referred. I was merely attracted by the remark he made, that the interview to which he referred was in the Baltimore Sun, and I only rose to state nothing more than that in the same paper in which that purported interview was published and from the same source a statement was made that that interview was unauthorized, and that Mr. Bayard disavowed it. I have nothing more to say about that. I have not been accustomed to debate with Senators or gentlemen anywhere in regard to what was imputed to them when they disavowed it, and I leave that to the Senator from Massachusetts to do if he chooses.

Mr. DAWES. If the Secretary of State has not said something about this apology it is high time he did. It is high time the public knew his opinion about this apology. It has been in his possession now for well-nigh two years. He tells Mr. Phelps that the indignity to our flag has caused great excitement and indignation among our people, and Mr. Phelps was instructed to lay it before the British Government, not before a satrap down in Nova Scotia or Newfoundland, and the British Government has from that day to this never expressed the slightest opinion one way or the other upon this flag business. It has simply made itself a mail-bag through which to transmit what a provincial official in the provinces has said about it, without expressing its opinion of regret or otherwise about this insult to our flag. I will put in the RECORD every word of what is called an apology, and if it is not considered by this Administration a full and ample apology, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] once in his seat pronounced it to be, then it is high time there was on the record something from this Administration to show its appreciation of an insult to the flag. This is all there is to it.

The minister regrets that he—

That is, Captain Quigley, the British officer—should have acted with undue zeal, although Captain Quigley may have been technically within his right while the vessel was in the custody of the law.

All this official down there regrets is that Captain Quigley, doing what he had a right to do, did not take more time to do it. That is the regret. Captain Quigley, he says, had a right to pull down the flag of the United States in the presence of the master of the vessel and cast it at his feet, if he had only taken more time to do it!

There is only one other apology that I ever heard of that was in any way parallel to this, and I think that this goes even beyond that. There was a church member once arraigned for accusing another church member of stealing, and being compelled to apologize said: "Brethren, I have accused Brother Smith of stealing, and I can not prove it, and I am sorry for it." This man says he can prove it if he would only take a little more time to do it.

If the Secretary of State has not called this a full apology, he has let it sleep, and the captains of the schooners engaged in the fishing interest are to understand that under this Administration any British official who chooses may pull down their flag on any charge that they have committed an offense, if he will only take time enough to do it.

As to Mr. Bayard's explanation of why he did not consult those interested in the matters affected by this treaty, why he did not consult the New England Senators, or anybody who was conversant with the nature of the subject-matter, the public prints declare that he has said this:

I did not consult with the New England Senators, but I did hear the opinions on this point of men known to be thoroughly conversant with the subject. Professor Baird told me that the men I had here in connection with the 3-mile limit question knew more about the fishery question than any one else in New England. They told me the privilege was valueless.

I do not know that Mr. Bayard made that statement. I am sorry, if he did, that he conceived the idea in this negotiation that it was no bigger question than hatching fish at Wood's Holl. If the Secretary of State went no further than to Professor Baird, however accomplished a man he may have been in hatching fish, I do not wonder at the mistakes and the blunders that were made if that was the conception of the Secretary and if he went no further for his sources of information.

It is not so much a source of astonishment to me that such a treaty has been what Mr. Bayard calls the result of such methods and such negotiations, as it is that such methods and negotiations should have entered into at all.

Sir, we are asked now to approve this treaty. What are we to expect if we reject it, the question is asked? What is to be the consequence? I expect that will follow, that will be which has been; I expect that when this treaty is rejected the same course will be pursued by the Canadian officials as has been pursued in the past. The purpose for which they entered into the negotiation was promoted and stimulated by a course in the past, which Mr. Phelps fittingly described in a letter sent by him to the British minister, which received the approval and commendation of Mr. Bayard himself, and which outlines not only clearly the purpose of these men in the past, but what I suppose they will resort to in the future. He says to Lord Rosebery June 2, 1886, in discussing the outrage committed upon the David J. Adams:

From all the circumstances attending this case, and other recent cases like it, it seems to me very apparent that the seizure was not made for the purpose of enforcing any right or redressing any wrong.

* * * * * * *

It seems to me impossible to escape the conclusion that this and other similar seizures were made by the Canadian authorities for the deliberate purpose of harassing and embarrassing the American fishing vessels in the pursuit of their lawful employment. And the injury, which would have been a serious one, if committed under a mistake, is very much aggravated by the motives which appear to have prompted it.

* * * * * * *

The real source of the difficuluy that has arisen is well understood. It is to be found in the irritation that has taken place among a portion of the Canadian people on account of the termination by the United States Government of the treaty of Washington on the 1st of July last, whereby fish imported from Canada into the United States, and which so long as that treaty remained in force was admitted free, is now liable to the import duty provided by the general revenue laws, and the opinion appears to have gained ground in Canada that the United States may be driven, by harassing and annoying their fishermen, into the adoption of a new treaty by which Canadian fish shall be admitted free.

It is not necessary to say that this scheme is likely to prove as mistaken in policy as it is indefensible in principle.

Alas! victim of misplaced confidence, "put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man."

In terminating the treaty of Washington the United States were simply exercising a right expressly reserved to both parties by the treaty itself, and of the exercise of which by either party neither can complain. They will not be coerced by wanton injury into the making of a new one.

What would he say now?

Nor would a negotiation that had its origin in mutual irritation be promising of success. The question now is, not what fresh treaty may or might be desirable, but what is the true and just construction, as between the two nations, of the treaty that already exists.

This, as I have said, was indorsed and commended as the true diagnosis of the trouble in Canada by Mr. Bayard himself. This is what I expect to see when the vote shall be taken on this treaty, but I expect that hereafter, as Mr. Phelps said then, negotiation that has its origin in such irritation will not be promising of success. That it will be tried there can be no manner of doubt. What will be the consequence no man can tell. Congress has clothed the President with ample power to meet the exigency. It is given out in a sort of threatening way by the friends of this treaty that unless it is approved the President will do more than his duty under that law. I am ready to commit it to his custody and to leave the responsibility with him. He has the power to tell these people, "You shall obey and keep the treaty of 1818 or you shall keep out of our ports till you do." If beyond this he has any power under the law and chooses to assert it, the responsibility is with him. Let him meet this question as the question was met in Fortune Bay. Let it be understood that negotiations go no further until present damages are redressed and security for the future given, and all the trouble will end.

But, sir, no man can in my judgment cast his vote for the ratification of this treaty as a treaty of peace. It is full of strife and contention and disturbance, and will multiply trouble on all hands. For that reason I can not give it my vote.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the destruction of life and property by war is so terrible to contemplate and so unreasonable that people in time of peace are apt to regard so great a folly impossible. No sane man in 1860 believed the North and South would be engaged in deadly conflict in 1861. No Frenchman believed in 1868 that a German army would occupy Paris in 1870. Immediate war is seldom anticipated, still the history of the world demonstrates that wars are inevitable. The progress of civilization has not restrained the tendency of nations to engage in war; on the contrary, the wars of the last generation have exceeded in magnitude and destruction the wars of any age. The preparations for war and the expenditures in organizing armies and navies and manufacturing instruments of destruction are beyond computation.

The navy of Great Britain dominates all the navigable waters of the globe. The sun never sets upon her harbors abundantly supplied with the materials of war and fortifications for defense. Unnatural as it is, she is our only enemy. There has been no time since the battle of Bunker Hill when she would not, if she could, have destroyed freedom in America and reduced the people of the United States to a dependency of her imperial power. Notwithstanding the vast commerce between the two nations, no act of the Government of Great Britain can be cited during the one hundred and twelve years of our independence indicating a desire for the perpetuity of our institutions; on the contrary, her conduct towards the United States has been always arrogant, aggressive, and insolent, and she has lost no opportunity to take advantage of our misfortunes and give aid and comfort to our enemies. In the war of the Revolution she disregarded the laws of modern warfare, employing the savages of America to massacre and outrage the defenseless families of our frontier, and treating prisoners of war with brutality and cruelty unparalleled in the annals of history. In the war of 1812 she violated every principle of modern warfare and in a spirit of wanton cruelty burned and destroyed the Capitol of the United States.

She labored for years to destroy the union of the States by organizing abolition societies, writing books, and issuing pamphlets to excite the sympathies of the North for the slaves in the South, and to arouse such indignation against the institution of human slavery on the part of the liberty-loving people of the free States as to make them demand the abolition of the institution of slavery, while she encouraged the South to maintain that institution and demand concessions and guaranties from the North, and when war between the two sections was imminent she hastened to recognize belligerent rights of the South and to patrol the ocean with her cruisers in the name of the Confederate States. She drove our commerce from the seas, ran our blockades, and carried on a profitable trade with the enemy. She sought every possible pretext for insulting our flag to provoke the United States into some act which would furnish an excuse for a declaration of war. She reluctantly made a treaty at the close of the war, in fear of our ironclads, against which she had no war vessels to compete, and gave us the pittance of $15,000,000 for her depredations on our commerce, after she had injured the people of the United States more than one thousand millions by her unfriendly conduct during our struggle for national existence. From this $15,000,000 she received back $5,500,000 for pretended grants of fishing privileges which already belonged to the United States by the law of nations and by every principle of comity and fair dealing.

She is now mistress of the seas. Her ironclads patrol our coasts in both oceans and menace all our seaboard towns. There is near 4,000 miles of crooked and unnatural boundary between us and her possessions on the north. She has constructed a national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and a network of railways tapping our commercial centers and competing with the railways of the United States. She demands free access to our markets, not only for the people of England, but also for the Dominion of Canada, while she is building up a rival nation on the north requiring standing armies, navies, forts, fortifications, and all the appliances of war to resist. She is building forts and arsenals from Halifax to Victoria, threatening the peace and security of the people of the United States.

The complications that will necessarily grow out of the rights and interests of Canada and the United States along this almost unlimited extent of ill-defined boundary must result in war. History furnishes no example of continued peace under such circumstances. It will not do to assume that such a war is impossible because its consequences would be so calamitous to the English-speaking race. Wherever the conditions which ordinarily produce war between neighboring nations exist, such as unnatural boundaries, national ambition, greed of conquest, real or imaginary insults, conflict of interest, and the like, sooner or later war is inevitable. The relations between the United States and Great Britain, complicated as they will continue to be by her occupancy of the vast region to the north, which of right should belong to the United States, and the larger part of which was obtained from our Government through duress and threats of war, must inevitably result in a conflict of arms.

The question is, will the United States in time of peace prepare for the coming war, or will she suffer Great Britain and Canada to destroy thousands of millions of her property and sacrifice the best blood of her citizens while she is preparing for the conflict? I am aware that many conscientious citizens of both countries are discussing means to secure universal peace and abolish war; that the enlightenment of the age is opposed to war; that many leading British statesmen desire a lasting peace between the United States and England, and that they are taking the initiative in a movement for the arbitration of all possible matters of dispute. All this sounds well to the ear, and is creditable to the heads and hearts of those engaged in this grand humanitarian and philanthropic enterprise. But all this is of little consequence in view of the warlike preparations of every nation on earth but our own. The governmental acts of every civilized country on the globe mean war. The advocates of peace are always silenced by the first gun fired in war. When other nations disarm and pursue only the arts of peace, then the United States may do the same, and not till then.

If the statesmen of Great Britain and the United States who advocate a union of the English-speaking nations in the interests of humanity, peace, civilization, and progress have any hope of success they must remove every cause of dispute which now exists. Great Britain already either rules or dominates nearly half the earth's surface. Her dominion is ample without trespassing on North American soil. She can well afford to allow the United States, which already contains more than half of the English-speaking people, to occupy North America. The United States is able, and, in view of the danger to free government growing out of the necessity of a standing army to guard the north, among other dangers to be avoided and advantages to be gained, ought to be willing to pay any compensation in money Great Britain may desire, if she will relinquish her sovereignty over the Dominion of Canada. In addition to that the United States can assume and pay all the debts of the Dominion, and receive the people of that country as friends and co-workers in the development and civilization of a continent, and extend to them all the rights and privileges of our free institutions on equal terms and conditions with the several States of the Union. Such a treaty would be in the interest of peace, in the interest of civilization, in the interest of human progress, and in the interest of the great Anglo-Saxon, English-speaking people, and would advance and promote the interests of mankind more than any other event that could possibly happen in any part of the civilized world. Such a consummation would unite all English-speaking people and remove every irritating cause which could mar the happiness, disturb the friendship, or retard the progress of the great progressive and dominant Anglo-Saxon race.

The most favorable construction of the fisheries treaty claimed for it by its friends removes no cause of irritation and gives no guaranty of more friendly relations between the contracting parties; on the contrary, the small, unfair, not to say mean, advantages secured by it to Canada add another grievance to the long list of aggressive and unfriendly acts which point to an ultimate conflict of arms. The success of English diplomatists in overreaching or outwitting the representatives of the United States has no tendency to heal the wounds inflicted upon the American people by the insolent outrages of Great Britain committed for a hundred years.

The time may come, if it has not yet arrived, when Great Britain shall consider seriously whether it is important for England to enjoy the friendship of the United States, or whether she will continue by arrogant, though, perhaps, petty aggressions, to badger and exasperate the people of America until some overt act of one country or the other shall culminate in a conflict which will set back the wheels of progress for a century and destroy the power and prestige of a race that has had no equal in the annals of history. It is impossible to predict all the results of a war between the United States and Great Britain. If precipitated now Great Britain would destroy thousands of millions of property and much human life while we were preparing for the struggle. The frenzy of wrath which such horrors would excite would produce such retaliation upon the commerce and dominion of Great Britain as the world has never seen.

The Dominion of Canada would be the theater of war, and the greatest sufferer, and whatever else might occur the war could not end while the British flag floated over an acre of land on the continent of America. In natural resources, in mechanical genius, in everything that constitutes the wealth of nations, the United States is to-day the superior of Great Britain, and however unprepared she might be at the beginning of the conflict she would ultimately have all the appliances of war on land and on sea necessary to conduct the war till her enemy was exhausted.

The United States has no enemy but Great Britain. The British Empire having enemies in Asia, Africa, and Europe, war with the United States would be a signal for a general settlement of accounts. However men may differ about the result of such a war, every friend of humanity must shudder at the prospect of such a catastrophe and exert every honorable precaution to avert it. It can now be easily averted. The people of Canada are, as a rule, friends of the United States. Their interest and destiny are joined with ours by race, by geographical position, and by the strongest ties of commercial and material intercourse.

A union with the United States would more than double the value of all property of the Dominion, relieve the people of the burdens of taxation, secure to them all the blessings of our free institutions, and provide for their products the best market in the world, and the only market which can render possible the development of the resources of the Dominion. The people of the United States would be vastly benefited by the great natural resources of coal, iron, lumber, fish, grain, hay, and other products of the Dominion, while both countries would be relieved from the necessity of standing armies, and a line of forts, arsenals, custom-houses, more than 4,000 miles in extent, and the imminent danger of all the horrors of impending war.

The sovereignty which Great Britain exercises over Canada adds nothing to her revenue or her military strength. On the contrary, it is a source of weakness and danger to the mother country. Why may not statesmen arise in the two countries equal to the occasion, who by honorable negotiation can blot out the history of all the wrongs and imaginary wrongs which both nations have suffered, or think they have suffered, from each other, and lay the foundation for a union of the great English speaking race. No price would be too dear for either nation to pay for a consummation so important to the Anglo-Saxon race and the civilization of the world. There should be no advantages of diplomacy on either side. Each should approach the great negotiation with a disposition to excel the other in generosity and concession. Let England name the sum which America shall pay.

Let the Dominion of Canada name the conditions of union and fellowship. Let the United States respond in a spirit of concession and generosity, asking no consideration for the benefits she would confer other than the acceptance by the people of Canada of the rights and privileges equal in all respects to those enjoyed by the people of the United States. If no treaty can be made with Great Britain and Canada upon these terms let all negotiations cease until there has been time for reflection and for consideration of the consequences of the results of the growing irritation between the United States and Great Britain and Canada.

If no negotiation can be had securing lasting peace, the dignity and honor of the United States, as well as her prosperity and safety, demand vigilance, activity, and energy in providing for the calamities which must result from our complicated relations with Great Britain.

Mr. TELLER. I notice the remarks of the Senator from Delaware with reference to the newspaper article that I inserted in the RECORD of yesterday, purporting to be an interview with the Secretary of State. I said before introducing this article, if I may be allowed to read what I said:

> Mr. President, I have alluded to an interview of the Secretary of State. This interview purports to have been on the 11th of July of this year. I would not willingly do injustice to the Secretary of State, and I would not assume that any newspaper article expressed his views if there were not good reasons to suppose that such was the fact; but this publication in the Sun, of the city of Baltimore, has been before the country for some time, and I am not aware that the Secretary has ever in any manner indicated his disapproval of the sentiments put in his mouth and said to have been uttered by him.

And then I added, after some other things:

> I propose, if this article is not true, to put it in official form, so that the Secretary of State may, if he desires, contradict it. He may think it beneath his dignity to deny a newspaper report, but it is a report so unjust to him if untrue, and so unjust to the Senate if true, that I do not think he can afford to overlook it.

Mr. President, if there is one thing in my life, public and private, that I have been particularly careful about, it has been not to bear false witness. I have been particularly careful in all my private and public life to make no charges upon a political opponent that I did not have every reason to believe to be true. I have said here in the Senate, and I repeat, that I would no more for political advantage charge a political opponent with that which I did not think he was guilty of than I would in the personal and private affairs of life. I produced this article supposing it to contain unquestionably the sentiments uttered by the Secretary of State. It had been bruited before the Senate a number of days, ten days before this publication, and had been discussed, and I had never heard a suggestion that it was not the work of the Secretary.

There seemed to be such particularity about it, and such knowledge of the case and of the circumstances, as to make it seem impossible that any newspaper man could have suggested it of his own motion. It was in keeping with some things said by the Secretary of State in his admitted letter to the Board of Trade of Boston. It contained things no more severe or discourteous to the Senate or the members of this body than were contained in that authentic letter of his.

Mr. FRYE. No worse than the interview published in the Boston Herald.

Mr. TELLER. No worse, as is suggested by the Senator from Maine, than the interview published in the Boston Herald, which I have not yet heard denied. I felt a sense of humiliation and disgrace when I read this interview. I had a feeling of indignation that a high official should thus speak of the members of a co-ordinate branch of the Government. I do not know now, Mr. President, that the Secretary of State disavows the sentiments of this interview.

I am not able to gather from what the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] says now whether the Secretary of State proposes to disavow it, to say that these are not his sentiments, that he did not say what is there said, or whether he means simply to say that he did not authorize the publication as coming from him. That seemed to me as near as the Senator from Delaware made it in his statement. I only want to say that when the Secretary of State disavows this in a way that shall come to me properly accredited, if I have done him any injustice, I shall be the first man to stand up here and say so. I shall let no pride of opinion or of position or place deter me at any time from taking back that which I have said if I was not justified in saying it. But I must wait until the Secretary of State now (this having become a matter of so much notoriety) shall in some authentic manner, either directly or through some friend in whom I can place entire confidence, disavow it.

Mr. GRAY. I do not care to make any answer to the Senator from Colorado further at this time. I can only repeat what I have already said, with the additional statement that I think the position of the Senator from Colorado is unfair to the Secretary of State in separating the publication of the article from the subsequent statement of the same paper to the effect that the article was not authorized by the Secretary of State. I have called attention to that subsequent statement made in the same paper. It is hardly worth while to repeat again the substance of that article published by that same paper, the next day but one I think it was, after the publication of what purported to be this interview.

But I do not intend to prolong this debate. As I said before, I do not care to go further with the matter, because I think I have done all that is necessary. After what I had stated, and after what I had declared as emphatically as I could that the same paper which had published the reported interview (not a statement of the Secretary of State, but a statement coming from the same source that published the interview), that it was unauthorized and inaccurate—and whether accurate or not, that it was unauthorized—the Senator from Massachusetts saw fit, after notice of the disavowal, and not before, to answer what purported to be the language of that interview. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to put upon record my disavowal of any intent to do any injustice to the Secretary of State. My own personal relations with him for a great many years have been such as would disarm any attempt or any desire on my part to do such a thing. The use I made of the interview published in the Baltimore Sun was after it had been before the public for over ten days and after it had appeared in the RECORD published yesterday morning. What struck me as singular was that if these were not the views or the ideas of the Secretary of State, he should not have taken the earliest opportunity to have as publicly disavowed them and censured them as they were publicly proclaimed, and especially to the men affected by the interview. And, if he did not desire to have any use made of it, such as I ventured to make, he had the amplest opportunity, after seeing the RECORD yesterday, to have communicated that fact in a way which would have disarmed everybody who holds for him, as I do, the highest respect. But nobody said a word of all this until after I brought out what I did to-day. Then the Senator from Delaware made the remark that this was an unauthorized publication. I do not hear yet anybody say that it is a publication of anything which Mr. Bayard disapproved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The treaty will be read by articles. The first article will be read.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask whether this is on the motion I made to postpone the consideration of this treaty until December?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to postpone is on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. And that is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, as this debate is to proceed, it is quite desirable as promptly and as clearly as possible that it should be ascertained what, in the judgment of the Secretary of State, is his true relation to that publication in the Baltimore Sun. When on this floor a publication is imputed to a member of the Senate, and he arises and disavows it, that is the end of the matter. But when we have a newspaper in one of its issues giving to its readers an elaborate and complete statement of the views of the Secretary of State, and when all that we have to meet that is a subsequent statement of an editor, the same editor, and in the same paper, and only in an editorial form—a statement of the degree and measure that has been declared to the Senate here—it still leaves it to turn entirely upon the editor's first and second publication.

When the Senator from Delaware was asked as to what he said on this floor in disavowal or in correction of the imputation of the first publication in the Sun, I understood him to say that he did not speak by any authority from the Secretary of State. Am I right in that?

Mr. GRAY nodded assent.

Mr. EVARTS. Now, as I propose to comment on the relations between this Government and that of Great Britain in this treaty and in all its negotiations, it is but fair that we should know from this time forward—not upon two contradictory statements and views of a newspaper—what the relation of the Secretary of State to that first publication is.

Mr. HAMPTON. I have not seen the interview to which the Senators from Massachusetts and New York have referred, but I understand that the Secretary of State has said that the interview was unauthorized, and I think among gentlemen that ought to be sufficient for them.

Mr. TELLER. I have yet to hear from anybody speaking by authority that the Secretary of State has said that it was unauthorized.

Mr. HAMPTON. The paper said it.

Mr. TELLER. I understand it is said that the paper said it, but I understand that those who have looked into the paper have not yet found that the paper said so.

Mr. HOAR. It does not say that the Secretary said so.

Mr. TELLER. I do not understand that the Secretary has said so, but that the paper has said so. I will wait until I hear from the Secretary of State.

Mr. MORGAN and Mr. EVARTS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MORGAN. I will give way to the Senator from New York. I do not wish to take part in this particular wrangle that is now going on.

Mr. EVARTS. Does the Senator from Alabama wish to speak to the question of this publication?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. EVARTS. I understand that a number, if not a very large number, of Senators on both sides of the Chamber expect to address the Senate on this treaty. So far as any arrangement on this side of the Chamber could be or should be made, I am expected to close the debate on our side; and as far as I can measure the expectation and wish of the Senators who are to take part in the debate, Monday next is the earliest day that I can name as the time when I shall address the Senate with the expectation that my observations will be the concluding observations from this side of the Chamber.

Mr. GIBSON. I have no desire to protract the discussion upon the subject of the alleged interview of the Secretary of State on the pending treaty with Great Britain, which I confess I have not read.

But I think the Senator from Massachusetts and my friend, the Senator from New York, should not treat the interview as if it were a letter in a newspaper signed by the Secretary of State. While they are generally circumspect and careful, we all know that some reporters for the newspapers do not hesitate to manufacture interviews with public men on questions that are attracting public attention, and that others put together the odds and ends of conversations and insert them in the newspapers as the matured opinions of gentlemen in public life.

It has often happened to me, in traveling and sometimes while I was in Washington, that alleged interviews were published as coming from me to which I was an entire stranger; and I heard my colleague say that during the past year six or seven interviews had appeared in the newspapers as from him which had not been held with him.

I submit that an interview should not be treated with the same weight and authenticity as speeches delivered in either House of Congress or as communications signed by Senators and Representatives or the high officers in the co-ordinate branches of the Government.

Now, sir, if this interview had been signed by the Secretary of State, criticising in a harsh and indecorous manner the Senators in this Chamber, it would be right and proper for them to resent it; for I hold that nothing is more important than that dignity and decorum should mark our relations, not only with one another, but with all the gentlemen in the public employment, each one of whom in some measure represents the good manners and courtesy that characterize our people.

But the interview is not signed by the Secretary of State. The sole authority for it is the newspaper in which it appeared.

The very authority by which it was given to the public declares it was done without the authority of the Secretary—that it was unauthorized by him. Hence the Secretary is without the slightest responsibility in the matter.

Not being responsible for it he can not be held to the obligation to disavow it. Nor do I believe any Senator could properly criticise the Secretary on account of the interview until he had first taken the pains to ascertain from the Secretary whether it appeared by his authority or not.

Would Senators have the Secretary of State, whose profound regard for the proprieties of life are well known by association with him in this Chamber—would Senators have him, whenever any newspaper attributed to him any particular sentiment reflecting upon them, to address a formal communication to them or to our Presiding Officer disowning and disavowing them?

Sir, it is sufficient that the newspaper which promulgated the interview and by whose authority it appeared should declare that it alone was responsible for it, and that the Secretary of State had not authorized it and was therefore not responsible. That is a complete disavowal by the newspaper for Mr. Bayard, and should satisfy the most sensitive Senators, even those whose minds are agitated by the heat and passions of a Presidential campaign.

Mr. EVARTS. I can not allow my friend from Louisiana to withdraw attention from the question that is now before us. I have not expressed one word of disapproval of that interview of Mr. Bayard. I have not commented on it. I have stated that it was to be the subject, as this debate went on, of further remark, and I desired that it should be definitely put before us what the relations of the Secretary of State to that publication were.

The Senator from Delaware is not able to speak by any authority from the Secretary, and we have nothing before us except an alleged interview, which very few of us perhaps have seen; but let us suppose it has been correctly enough stated—and an editorial statement that that publication was not authorized by Mr. Bayard. Now, that is the proposition. The Senator has, I think, some qualifying phrases which are suitable and which I do not comment upon. If it is made to me apparent that the publication is disavowed by Mr. Bayard, then I shall take no note of it and make no reference to it whatever.

But is this dealing fairly with us? When an elaborate, consecutive, deliberative, argumentative concatenation of ideas is spread out in the name of a Secretary of State by a newspaper in friendly relations and those not of disparagement or involving him in difficulty, it is not enough to my mind that the editor says "this publication that appeared the other day was not authorized by the Secretary of State."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion to postpone the further consideration of this treaty until the first Monday in December next?

Mr. MORGAN. Inasmuch as the Senator from New York has indicated his desire to speak, and other Senators wish to participate in this debate, I move that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of legislative business.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 2190) granting a pension to Jane Smallridge;
A bill (H. R. 3055) for the relief of A. F. St. Sure Lindefelt;
A bill (H. R. 4504) granting a pension to Nancy Baldwin;
A bill (H. R. 5123) to increase the pension of Charles Ritchey;
A bill (H. R. 5155) granting a pension to John S. Bryant;
A bill (H. R. 6371) granting a pension to Jesse M. Stilwell;
A bill (H. R. 9130) granting a pension to Susan Singleton;
A bill (H. R. 9263) granting increase of pension to Abraham J. Buckles;
A bill (H. R. 9358) to increase the pension of Rosalie O'Sullivan;
A bill (H. R. 9363) granting a pension to Edwin J. Godfrey;
A bill (H. R. 9672) granting a pension to Eliza A. Williamson; and
A bill (H. R. 9830) for the relief of Lachlan H. McIntosh.

FOURTH ANNUAL REPORT OF CIVIL-SERVICE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the second section of chapter 27 of the laws of 1883, entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," I herewith transmit the fourth report of the United States Civil-Service Commission, covering the period between the 16th day of January, 1886, and the 1st day of July, 1887.

While this report has especial reference to the operations of the Commission during the period above mentioned, it contains, with its accompanying appendices, much valuable information concerning the inception of civil-service reform and its growth and progress, which can not fail to be interesting and instructive to all who desire improvement in administrative methods.

During the time covered by the report 15,852 persons were examined for admission in the classified civil service of the Government in all its branches; of whom 10,746 passed the examination and 5,106 failed. Of those who passed the examination, 2,977 were applicants for admission to the departmental service at Washington, 2,547 were examined for admission to the customs service, and 5,222 for admission to the postal service. During the same period 547 appointments were made from the eligible lists to the departmental service, 641 to the customs service, and 3,254 to the postal service.

Concerning separations from the classified service, the report only informs us of such as have occurred among employés in the public service who had been appointed from eligible lists under civil-service rules. When these rules took effect they did not apply to the persons then in the service, comprising a full complement of employés who obtained their positions independently of the new law. The commission has no record of the separations in this numerous class, and the discrepancy apparent in the report between the number of appointments made in the respective branches of the service from the lists of the commission, and the small number of separations mentioned, is, to a great extent, accounted for by vacancies of which no report was made to the Commission, occurring among those who held their places without examination and certification, which vacancies were filled by appointment from the eligible lists.

In the departmental service there occurred between the 16th day of January, 1886, and the 30th day of June, 1887, among the employés appointed from the eligible lists under civil-service rules, seventeen removals, thirty-six resignations, and five deaths. This does not include fourteen separations in the grade of special examiners, four by removal, five by resignation, and five by death.

In the classified customs and postal service the number of separations among those who received absolute appointments under civil-service rules are given for the period between the 1st day of January, 1886, and the 30th day of June, 1887. It appears that such separations in the customs service for the time mentioned embraced twenty-one removals, five deaths, and eighteen resignations, and in the postal service two hundred and fifty-six removals, twenty-three deaths, and four hundred and sixty-nine resignations.

More than a year has passed since the expiration of the period covered by the report of the commission. Within the time which has thus elapsed many important changes have taken place in furtherance of a reform in our civil service. The rules and regulations governing the execution of the law upon the subject have been completely remodeled in such manner as to render the enforcement of the statute more effective and greatly increase its usefulness.

Among other things, the scope of the examinations prescribed for those who seek to enter the classified service has been better defined and made more practical, the number of names to be certified from the eligible lists to the appointing officers from which a selection is made has been reduced from four to three, the maximum limitation of the age of persons seeking entrance to the classified service to forty-five years has been changed, and reasonable provision has been made for the transfer of employés from one Department to another in proper cases. A plan has also been devised providing for the examination of applicants for promotion in the service, which, when in full operation, will eliminate all chance of favoritism in the advancement of employés, by making promotion a reward of merit and faithful discharge of duty.

Until within a few weeks there was no uniform classification of employés in the different Executive Departments of the Government. As a result of this condition, in some of the Departments positions could be obtained without civil-service examination because they were not within the classification of such Department, while in other Departments an examination and certification were necessary to obtain positions of the same grade, because such positions were embraced in the classifications applicable to those Departments.

The exception of laborers, watchmen, and messengers from examination and classification gave opportunity, in the absence of any rule guarding against it, for the employment, free from civil-service restrictions, of persons under these designations who were immediately detailed to do clerical work.

All this has been obviated by the application to all the Departments of an extended and uniform classification embracing grades of employés not heretofore included, and by the adoption of a rule prohibiting the detail of laborers, watchmen, or messengers to clerical duty.

The path of civil-service reform has not at all times been pleasant nor easy. The scope and purpose of the reform have been much misapprehended; and this has not only given rise to strong opposition, but has led to its invocation by its friends to compass objects not in the least related to it. Thus partisans of the patronage system have naturally condemned it. Those who do not understand its meaning either mistrust it, or when disappointed because in its present stage it is not applied to every real or imaginary ill, accuse those charged with its enforcement with faithlessness to civil-service reform.

Its importance has frequently been underestimated; and the support of good men has thus been lost by their lack of interest in its success. Besides all these difficulties, those responsible for the administration of the Government in its executive branches have been and still are often annoyed and irritated by the disloyalty to the service and the insolence of employés who remain in place as the beneficiaries, and the relics and reminders of the vicious system of appointment which civil-service reform was intended to displace.

And yet these are but the incidents of an advance movement, which is radical and far-reaching. The people are, notwithstanding, to be congratulated upon the progress which has been made, and upon the firm, practical, and sensible foundation upon which this reform now rests.

With a continuation of the intelligent fidelity which has hitherto characterized the work of the commission, with a continuation and increase of the favor and liberality which have lately been evinced by the Congress in the proper equipment of the commission for its work, with a firm but conservative and reasonable support of the reform by all its friends, and with the disappearance of opposition which must inevitably follow its better understanding, the execution of the civil-service law can not fail to ultimately answer the hopes in which it had its origin.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 21, 1888.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are three committees, to either of which this message and the accompanying documents may be referred—that on Civil Service and Retrenchment, of which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] is chairman; that to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service, of which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] is chairman; and the Select Committee to Examine into the Condition of Civil Service, of which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is chairman. The Chair will await a motion as to which committee the Senate desires the message to be referred.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it should be referred to the standing Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the message, with its accompanying documents, be referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. PLATT. Is that the committee of which the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] is chairman?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is the committee with which the bill on civil service originated.

The motion was agreed to; and the message was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3234) to provide for writs of error to the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas in certain cases, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to report back from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (H. R. 10604) to authorize the Winona and Southwestern Railway Company to build a bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona, Minn., which, by some clerical or other mistake, an unusual thing I am happy to say, was referred to that committee. I ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The report was agreed to.

JACKSON (MISS.) MUNICIPAL ELECTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. On the 12th of January last the Senate passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the suppression of the votes of the colored citizens of Jackson, Miss., at the recent municipal election in that city, and into the alleged participation in such suppression by the United States district attorney and by a deputy collector of internal revenue and a deputy United States marshal; and to report the facts to the Senate.

By direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I now submit the report. I will state that within a day or two the evidence taken by the committee will be submitted to the Senate. It is withheld for the present until the index can be completed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and printed.

Mr. PLATT. Printed with the evidence.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire, of course, that the evidence be printed.

Mr. GEORGE. It was the desire of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], who is the senior member of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, and who is not present, I see, to announce the dissent of the minority of the committee, and to ask leave to file the views of the minority. I give the notice now in his behalf.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views of the minority will be received when presented, and printed with the report of the majority, if not otherwise ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 3367) for the relief of the legal representatives of James Hale; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 3368) for the relief of Thomas G. Mackie and the heirs-at-law of William A. Hyde, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEWART and Mr. CULLOM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada is entitled to the floor. The Senate will now resume the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 12) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEWART. That bill has been postponed from time to time, and I think it would be well to have it disposed of, but if it is desired that other matters should be taken up, I do not care to say who shall have the floor and who not. If this bill can have its position to-morrow, I am willing that it should be laid aside for the present without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be agreed to if there be no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OTTUMWA, IOWA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to take up House bill 9771, Order of Business 1875.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9771) for the erection of a public building at Ottumwa, Iowa.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. M. WOODRUFF.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 1849, being the bill (S. 1668) for the relief of A. M. Woodruff.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to A. M. Woodruff, of Pulaski County, Arkansas, $933.33, for wood sold by him for fuel for the Fifty-fourth Regiment of United States Infantry, colored, during the years 1865 and 1866, and for which proper vouchers were issued and delivered to him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOUTHERN ILLINOIS NORMAL UNIVERSITY.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1898, being the bill (H. R. 7452) for the relief of the Southern Illinois Normal University.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to relieve the Southern Illinois Normal University, at Carbondale, Ill., from all money responsibility for so much of the ordnance and ordnance stores issued to the university under bond dated August 21, 1878, as was destroyed by fire on November 26, 1883.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES O'BRIEN.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed at this time to consider Order of Business No. 1630, being the bill (H. R. 6602) for the relief of James Obrion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Finance with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "James," to strike out "Obrion" and insert "O'Brien;" so as make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to James O'Brien, late a deputy collector of the First Tennessee district, the sum of $210.10, the amount paid by him under the direction of the collector in suppressing illicit distilleries in said district, as is fully shown by the records in the Internal Revenue Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of James O'Brien."

THOMAS W. LORD.

Mr. PALMER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1606, being House bill No. 409.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 409) for the relief of Thomas W. Lord. It proposes to authorize the President of the United States to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint First Lieut. Thomas W. Lord, United States Army, retired, a captain on the retired-list of the Army, with the retired pay of that grade from the date of such appointment.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report in that case be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. MANDERSON June 14, 1888, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 409) for the relief of Thomas W. Lord, have duly considered the same, and report it back favorably and recommend its passage.

The rule adopted by your committee in cases of this character has been that the applicant will not be authorized to be retired in rank above that held by him at the time of his resignation or retirement, or have his rank on the retired-list raised; from which it would follow that no relief would be granted to Lieutenant Lord.

But from the fact that the circumstances here are exceptional such would be the conclusion of your committee.

Lieutenant Lord was mustered as sergeant in Company K, Seventeenth Maine Infantry Volunteers, July, 1882.

Mr. PALMER. I would suggest that that should be 1862. It is a misprint.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the report, as follows:

He served at Fredericksburgh December, 1862; was promoted to a second lieutenancy March, 1863; lost his left leg and was severely wounded in his right foot at the battle of Chancellorsville May, 1863, being specially mentioned in general orders for gallantry during that engagement, and subsequently received the brevet of captain for services there.

He was discharged September, 1863, on account of his wounds. In December, 1863, was appointed a second lieutenant in the Invalid Corps, serving on the staff of General A. P. Hovey. In 1866 he was appointed a second lieutenant in the Forty-third United States Infantry, and acted as adjutant until 1869 when he was assigned to the Twentieth United States Infantry. In 1871 he became regimental quartermaster, holding that position nearly twelve years, serving at important posts on the frontier. He was retired August 25, 1887, as a first lieutenant, being then senior in that grade, and but for his being retired at that time, because of a vacancy which would have occurred in the rank of captain six days only thereafter, he would have been retired as captain.

An effort to stay the order for his retirement until August 31 was not successful, because the President had established the precedent that officers who had been recommended for retirement should not be promoted. No notice was taken of the exceptional circumstances surrounding Lieutenant Lord's case, and because of this and some other facts surrounding the same Lieutenant Lord appeals to Congress.

In this connection it is proper to note that Lieutenant Lord was recommended for retirement by a board in 1871, but the order was revoked, to enable him to accept the position of regimental quartermaster. He was thereafter promoted to first lieutenant, and was in active service fourteen years. These circumstances seem to render this case exceptional in character.

The conclusion reached by your committee is not without precedent to support it—from naval affairs. In the Forty-eighth Congress, first session, Lieut. W. P. Randall asked Congress to authorize the President to appoint him a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy. The board had rejected his application for promotion because of physical disabilities received in service and line of duty; but the relief asked for was granted, and he was retired as a lieutenant-commander. (24 Stat. at Large, page 14, chapter 27.)

In the Senate Report (S. 367) No. 53 in that case the Committee on Naval Affairs say:

"To summarize the case, it appears that Mr. Randall entered the service in July, 1861, as acting master; that he was an officer of conspicuous gallantry and ability, winning promotion from grade to grade until, in March, 1865, he became a lieutenant-commander, with which rank he was honorably discharged from the volunteer service December 19, 1865. Less than a year later he was appointed in the regular Navy, and, beginning again at the foot, had, in 1870, reached the rank of lieutenant. After twelve years' service in that grade he was ordered before a medical board to be examined for promotion, and was rejected for reasons stated.

"The committee is especially impressed with the fact that the disabilities which prevented his promotion to the rank he now seeks had existed during practically the entire period of his service; that the hernia and deafness were caused by injuries received in the line of duty aboard the Cumberland, and that throughout his twenty years of service they had not interfered with the prompt and entirely efficient performance of his whole duty."

Your committee agree, therefore, in the conclusion reached by the House committee on this bill. They say:

"Had he been allowed to remain in the service six days more a vacancy would have occurred, and Lord entitled to promotion as captain; but had he remained, under the ruling of the President Mr. Lord would not have been promoted, because of his being recommended for retirement some years ago on account of the loss of his leg in battle.

"Now, while your committee agree with the President that officers who, on account of wounds or disabilities incurred in the service, had better be placed upon the retired-list, it thinks that where officers have performed gallant and meritorious service, and have been retained in active service for over twenty years, and have performed said service efficiently, as several of Lieutenant Lord's superior officers say of him, 'with unusual efficiency,' they should not be retired upon the eve of a merited promotion."

The service of Lieutenant Lord is hereto annexed and made a part of this report.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 26, 1888.

Statement of the military service of Thomas W. Lord, of the United States Army, compiled from the records of this office.

VOLUNTEER RECORD.

He served as sergeant, Company K, Seventeenth Maine Infantry, from July 21, 1862, to February 23, 1863, when he was mustered in as second lieutenant of his company.

He was wounded in action at Chancellorsville, Va., May 2, 1863, resulting in amputation of his left leg, and was honorably mustered out September 8, 1863.

He received the brevet of captain March 13, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Chancellorsville, Va."

He was appointed second lieutenant, Veteran Reserve Corps, December 8, 1863; first lieutenant June 5, 1865, and honorably mustered out October 3, 1866.

REGULAR ARMY RECORD.

He was appointed second lieutenant, Forty-third Infantry, July 28, 1866; unassigned April 8, 1869; assigned to Twentieth Infantry July 14, 1869, and promoted first lieutenant October 1, 1871.

He was adjutant, Forty-third Infantry, January 12, 1867, to April 8, 1869, and regimental quartermaster, Twentieth Infantry, October 1, 1871, to June 30, 1883.

He received the brevet of first lieutenant March 2, 1867, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Chancellorsville, Va."

He was on regimental recruiting service November 6, 1866, to January, 1867; with regiment in Michigan to March 22, 1868; on leave on April 12, 1868; with regiment in Michigan to April 12, 1869; awaiting orders to July, 1869; on duty at Yankton Indian agency, Dak., to June, 1870; with regiment in Dakota to October 4, 1870; before retiring board at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., to November, 1870; with regiment in Dakota to August 29, 1871; on sick leave to (retired by Special Orders No. 351, Adjutant-General's Office, September 8, 1871; order retiring him revoked by Special Orders No. 374, Adjutant-General's Office, September 23, 1871) October 27, 1871; with regiment in Minnesota to May 16, 1872; on leave to June 7, 1872; with regiment in Minnesota to January 6, 1873; on leave to February 6, 1873; with regiment in Minnesota to June 8, 1874; on detached service at Davenport, Iowa, to July 12, 1874; with regiment in Minnesota to September 4, 1874; on leave to October 14, 1874; with regiment in Minnesota to June 4, 1875; member of board for purchase of horses to July 12, 1875; with regiment in Minnesota to December 3, 1875; on leave to January 6, 1876; with regiment in Minnesota to October 10, 1876; on leave to November 10, 1876; with regiment in Minnesota to December 20, 1877, and in Texas to May 27, 1879; on leave to September 26, 1879; with regiment in Texas to July 17, 1880; on leave to August 25, 1880; with regiment in Texas to August 19, 1881; on sick leave and surgeon's certificate of disability to September 29, 1882; with regiment in Kansas to August 6, 1883, and in the Indian Territory to March 7, 1884; on leave to May 13, 1884; on surgeon's certificate of disability to May 16, 1884; with regiment in the Indian Territory to May 6, 1885; at Fort Assinniboine, Mont., to June 20, 1885; on detached service at Coal Banks, Mont., to August 7, 1885; with company at Fort Assinniboine, Mont., to (being sick in quarters January 31, to February 5, 1886) March 16, 1886; on sick leave to August 25, 1887, upon which date he was retired from active service.

J. C. KELTON,
Acting Adjutant-General.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator whether this officer is getting a pension now or not?

Mr. MANDERSON. He could not possibly be getting a pension, being on the retired-list now with the rank of lieutenant. While I do not recall ever asking that question, I am very positive that he is not. In fact he could not, under the law, be in receipt of a pension, being, as I have said, on the retired-list now, with the rank of lieutenant.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

C. L. WILSON.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar number 1883, being the bill (H. R. 7232) for the relief of C. L. Wilson.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to credit the account of C. L. Wilson, postmaster at Milford, Ellis County, Texas, with $50, for money lost in transit.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYÉS IN GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar number 1701, being House bill 1338.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 1338) to extend the leave of absence of employés in the Government Printing Office to thirty days per annum, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the act entitled "An act granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office," approved June 30, 1886, so as to extend the annual leave of absence therein described to thirty days in each fiscal year; and provides that it shall be lawful to allow pro rata leave to those serving fractional parts of a year.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MATTIE S. WHITNEY.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent that Order of Business 487, Senate bill 2185, be now taken up and considered. It has passed the Senate once during this session and placed on the deficiency bill, as will be seen by the Record. The House, however, refused to concur in the amendment, and so it was lost.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the order of business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. Order of Business 487, being the bill (S. 2185) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Mattie S. Whitney, as administratrix of Franklin S. Whitney, deceased, heretofore referred to said court.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Mattie S. Whitney, as administratrix of the estate of Franklin S. Whitney, deceased, $22,224, in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States, for supplies furnished to the Army and Navy, the same being the amount found to be due her by the Court of Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS L. HOFFMAN.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1565, being the bill (S. 2636) for the relief of Thomas L. Hoffman.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Thomas L. Hoffman $625, in payment of his claim for money paid by him for the United States for rent of the post-office at Fairfield, Iowa, in accordance with the terms of a lease held by the United States, and in pursuance of the instructions of the Post-Office Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may take up the individual pension bills to-morrow morning after the morning business, and spend an hour on them, if necessary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the morning business, the Senate take up for consideration private pension bills upon the Calendar favorably reported.

Mr. HOAR. I think that matter ought to be understood with the Senator who has the floor on the treaty, because these pension cases always go through. There will be no difficulty about them.

Mr. SAWYER. We have over a hundred cases.

Mr. HOAR. I would inquire of the Chair what Senator has the floor on the treaty?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No Senator has been recognized on the treaty. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] has given notice that he will take the floor on Monday next. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent——

Mr. HOAR. I will interpose an objection at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. President——

Mr. STEWART. I am very anxious to finish the Chinese bill. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has not finished his speech on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being interposed, the Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. SAWYER. Then I ask that we consider private pension bills the day after to-morrow, and that unanimous consent be now given to take them up at that time.

Mr. HOAR. Let the Senator ask unanimous consent to-morrow morning, and I presume there will be no difficulty.

Mr. SAWYER. Very well; I will try to-morrow morning.

FARAN AND M'LEAN.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 1851, being the bill (S. 308) for the relief of Faran & McLean.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to reopen and reconsider the claim of Faran & McLean for the refunding of certain taxes alleged to have been improperly and illegally assessed and collected, namely, for $2,260, as claimed by them in the papers now on file in the Treasury Department; and if, upon reopening and reconsidering the claim, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall find these taxes, or any part of the same, to have been illegally or improperly assessed and collected from the claimants, he is to audit and ascertain the amount of taxes so illegally and improperly collected, deducting, however, any legal unpaid taxes which they should have paid and did not, if any such there be, under section 103 of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes;" and the Secretary of the Treasury is to pay the amount of taxes so found by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have been illegally and improperly assessed and collected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF THOMAS NILES.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar number 1840, being the bill (S. 878) for the relief of the estate of Thomas Niles, deceased.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 4, before the word "personal," to strike out "estate and;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the personal representatives of Thomas Niles, deceased, late of Gloucester, Mass., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $6,760, in full compensation for damages to the land of the said Thomas Niles, deceased, near Gloucester, Mass., by the erection of a permanent fort thereon by the United States, in 1863, for the defense of the harbor of Gloucester.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALFONSO ROBERTS.

Mr. TELLER. I ask unanimous consent to take up Calendar No. 1837, being the bill (S. 3125) restoring the right of pre-emption to Alfonso Roberts.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize Alfonso Roberts to pre-empt the land in Colorado for which he filed a claim in 1884, on making the proofs required by the provisions of the pre-emption law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREGON PAVING AND CONTRACT COMPANY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Order of Business 1800, being Senate bill 3159, for the relief of the Oregon Paving and Contract Company.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment in line 8, before the word "day," to insert "second;" in the same line, after the word "of," to insert "June;" and in line 9, after the word "eighty," to insert "seven;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to cancel a certain contract entered into by and between the Oregon Paving and Contract Company, of the one part, and Capt. Charles F. Powell, United States engineer, acting for and on behalf of the United States, of the other part, and dated the 2d day of June, A. D. 1887, whereby said Oregon Paving and Contract Company contracted to furnish a certain amount of stone of certain dimensions to be used in the improvement of the mouth of the Columbia River, Oregon, on such terms as he may deem equitable and just.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 24, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 23, 1888.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MANSUR, indefinitely, on account of business.

To Mr. GALLINGER, for this day, on account of illness.

To Mr. MCMILLIN, for four days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. LANDES, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. BOOTHMAN, until the 30th instant, on account of important business.

To Mr. JONES, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, for twelve days, on account of important business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman to withdraw that demand for a few minutes, in the interest of a measure of great public importance, which the Department is pressing upon Congress. I mean the bill to perfect the quarantine service of the United States. It is a Senate bill; it passed the Senate unanimously; it has been reported from the House Committee on Commerce unanimously, and is on the Calendar, and there are reasons suggested in the public press this morning why it should be passed without delay. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope that may be done, Mr. Speaker. It is a bill of great importance.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will permit me to join with him in the request for the immediate consideration of this quarantine bill, as my State is directly interested in its passage.

Mr. DINGLEY. The country generally is interested.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Yes, the whole country is interested in it, but my State is directly interested.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will yield for that bill.

QUARANTINE SERVICE.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 2493) to perfect the quarantine service of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That whenever any person shall trespass upon the grounds belonging to any quarantine reservation, or whenever any person, master, pilot, or owner of a vessel entering any port of the United States, shall so enter in violation of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States," approved April 29, 1878, or in violation of the quarantine regulations framed under said act, such person trespassing, or such master, pilot, or other person in command of a vessel shall, upon conviction thereof, pay a fine of not more than $300, or be sentenced to imprisonment for a period of not more than thirty days, or shall be punished by both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court. And it shall be the duty of the United States attorney in the district where the misdemeanor shall have been committed to take immediate cognizance of the offense, upon report made to him by any medical officer of the Marine Hospital Service, or by any officer of the customs service, or by any State officer acting under authority of section 5 of said act.

SEC. 2. That as soon after the passage of this act as practicable, the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be established, in addition to the quarantine established by the act approved March 5, 1888, quarantine stations, as follows: One at the mouth of the Delaware Bay; one near Cape Charles, at the entrance of the Chesapeake Bay; one on the Georgia coast; one at or near Key West; one in San Diego Harbor; one in San Francisco Harbor; and one at or near Port Townsend, at the entrance to Puget Sound; and the said quarantine stations when so established shall be conducted by the Marine Hospital Service under regulations framed in accordance with the act of April 29, 1878.

SEC. 3. That there are appropriated for the purposes of this act the following sums, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction, equipment, and necessary expenses of maintaining the same for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889.

For the Delaware Breakwater quarantine: Construction of disinfecting machinery, steam-tug, warehouse, officers' quarters, and expenses of maintenance for the fiscal year 1889, $75,000.

For the quarantine station near Cape Charles, Virginia: For the purchase of site, construction of wharf, repair of present hospital buildings and officers' quarters, disinfecting machinery, steam-tug, expenses of maintenance for the year 1889, $112,000.

For the South Atlantic Station (Sapelo Sound): Construction of disinfecting machinery, warehouse, wharf, small boats, and expenses of maintenance for the year 1889, $38,500.

For the quarantine near Key West: Purchase of site, construction of disinfecting machinery, warehouse, small boats, steam-tug, hospital buildings and officers' quarters, expenses of maintenance for the year 1889, $88,000.

For the Gulf quarantine (formerly Ship Island), provided for by the act of March 5, 1888, in addition to the amount appropriated by the act approved March 5, 1888: For the expenses for the year ending June 30, 1889, $15,000.

Quarantine station, San Diego Harbor, California: For the purchase of site and the construction of disinfecting machinery, warehouse, small boats, hospital buildings, officers' quarters, and for expenses of maintenance for 1889, $55,500.

For the quarantine station at San Francisco, Cal.: Hospital buildings and officers' quarters, disinfecting machinery, warehouse and warf, steam-tug, small boats, expenses for the fiscal year 1889, $103,000.

Passed the Senate May 3, 1888.

Attest:

ANSON G. MCCOOK,
Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that the bill be now considered in the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CRISP moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of States and Territories for the consideration and reference of bills and resolutions.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent that the call be dispensed with, and that gentlemen having bills or resolutions to introduce may have leave to send them to the Clerk's desk for reference to the appropriate committees.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

The following bills were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALLENTOWN, PA.

Mr. SOWDEN introduced a bill (H. R. 10927) for the erection of a public building at Allentown, Pa.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PRODUCTS OF TRUSTS.

Mr. SPRINGER introduced a bill (H. R. 10928) to tax the products of trusts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

J. M. BIVINS.

Mr. ROWLAND introduced a bill (H. R. 10929) for the relief of J. M. Bivins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

GUNS AND AMMUNITION FOR THE NAVY.

Mr. SHIVELY (by request) introduced a bill (H. R. 10930) to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Navy to contract for certain guns and ammunition therefor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS FOR QUARANTINE PURPOSES.

Mr. WILKINSON introduced a bill (H. R. 10931) to donate and transfer to the State of Louisiana for quarantine purposes certain lands on the Mississippi River, belonging to the United States, subject to reversion to the United States in the event of their non-usage for quarantine purposes, and requiring the proper Department of the United States Government to execute the necessary transfer to the State of Louisiana on the condition aforesaid; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. HATCH introduced a bill (H. R. 10932) to authorize the refunding of the national debt into a uniform consolidated bond; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SWORDS OF GENERAL JAMES SHIELDS.

Mr. MANSUR introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 202) to construe an act passed at this session, entitled "An act to purchase of the widow and children of the late General James Shields certain swords;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WHARF ON THE POTOMAC RIVER.

Mr. SNYDER introduced a bill (H. R. 10933) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to construct a suitable city wharf on the Potomac River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

TOWNSHIP MAPS.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. 4945) authorizing the Commissioner of Public Lands to furnish citizens maps at cost; which was laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, reported, in the nature of a substitute for the foregoing, a bill (H. R. 10934) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell township maps or plats remaining on hand in his office; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL MILITARY AND NAVAL MUSEUM.

Mr. TOWNSHEND submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the House of Representatives what collections suitable to be embodied in a national military and naval museum are now in existence in their respective Departments, and what materials for such collections can be found in any of the arsenals, posts, navy-yards, and stations, and what further steps should be taken in order that an effective permanent exhibition may be made in this city illustrative of the history of military and naval invention, organization, construction, and equipment in the United States and of the principal battles in which United States troops have been engaged, and they are respectively authorized in their discretion to detail one or more officers to aid in the preparation of the reports called for in this resolution, which reports shall contain any suggestions they may desire to make in regard to the establishment of a national and military and naval museum in the city of Washington of a scope and character similar to the museums now in existence in the principal cities of Europe.

MILITARY AND NAVAL CADETS.

Mr. OATES introduced a bill (H. R. 10935) to require an additional oath of cadets to the United States Military and Naval Academies; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AGREEMENT WITH INDIAN TRIBES, IDAHO.

Mr. DUBOIS introduced a bill (H. R. 10936) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the Shoshones, Bannacks, and Sheepeaters of the Fort Hall and Lemhi reservations in Idaho, May 14, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF REPORTS OF COMMISSIONER OF LABOR.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 203) providing for the printing of the first and second annual reports of the Commissioner of Labor; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATING FEDERAL ELECTIONS, ETC.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, introduced a bill (H. R. 10937) regulating Federal elections and to promote the purity of the ballot; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Elections, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the fourth Monday of the month, it is set apart for the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, if claimed by that committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is there a call this morning for reports from committees?

The SPEAKER. There is none under the rule on this Monday.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the House has given the Committee on Printing leave on next Saturday to call up certain business reported from that committee, I ask unanimous consent to present three or four reports, so that they may be referred and printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SPECIAL REPORT UPON INSECTS, ETC.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the resolution to print second edition of special report upon insects affecting the orange crop; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SPECIAL REPORT ON WHITE SCALE AND OTHER INSECTS.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the resolution to print special report on white scale and other insects; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF CAPTAIN HEALY OF 1884 AND 1885.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to print 5,000 copies of report of Captain Healy, of revenue-steamer Corwin, in Arctic Ocean, 1885; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to print 5,000 copies of report of Captain Healy, of revenue-steamer Corwin, in Arctic Ocean, 1884; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF CHIEF OF BUREAU OF STATISTICS, ETC.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the joint resolution (S. R. 99) providing for the printing of the portion of the annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics on Commerce and Navigation for the year ending June 30, 1887, entitled "Annual Report of the Bureau of Statistics in regard to imported merchandise entered for consumption in the United States, with amounts of duty and rates of duty collected;" which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRINTING COMMITTEE REPORTS.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably joint resolution (H. Res. 142) authorizing the printing of committee reports; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON WOOL, ETC.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably the concurrent resolution to print 17,000 copies of the recent report of Chief of Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, on wool, etc.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENT TO WHARTON'S DIGEST OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably joint resolution (S. R. 27) providing for the printing of a supplement to Wharton's Digest of International Law; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COMPILATION OF SENATE AND HOUSE REPORTS.

Mr. RICHARDSON also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back favorably joint resolution (S. R. 77) providing for a duplicate of the compilation of the reports of the Senate and House of Representatives from 1815 to 1887; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, reported back adversely concurrent resolution providing for a duplicate of the compilation of the reports of committees, etc.; which was laid on the table.

FIRE-ESCAPES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 10346) providing for the erection of fire-escapes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby empowered to make such regulations as they may deem necessary for the erection and maintenance of fire-escapes and stand-pipes, of iron or other incombustible material, as the said commissioners may require, on every building in said District now or hereafter used principally as a hotel, factory, manufactory, theater, tenement-house, seminary, college, academy, hospital, asylum, or hall or place of amusement, and upon the neglect or failure of the owner or owners or the persons, corporations, agents, trustees, or board of directors representing the ownership of any such building or buildings, to comply with such regulations, after thirty days' notice so to do, the commissioners shall cause to be erected upon any such building such of said appliances as in their judgment may be necessary, the cost of which shall be paid by the Treasurer of the United States, on the warrant of the said commissioners, out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia and not otherwise appropriated; and for such cost the commissioners of the District of Columbia, or their successors, shall, within ten days after payment of the same as aforesaid, issue a certificate of indebtedness against the building on which said appliances shall so have been erected and the ground on which said building may stand, which certificate shall bear interest until paid at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, and until paid said certificate and the cost represented thereby shall be and remain a lien upon the property on or against which the same shall so have been issued as aforesaid; and if the amount of any such certificate shall not be paid within one year from the issue thereof, the said commissioners, or their successors, upon the application of the holder of such certificate, shall, after advertisement twice a week for three successive weeks in the regular issue of some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia, proceed to sell at public auction to the highest bidder the property against which said certificate shall so have been issued; and a deed signed and acknowledged by the said commissioners, or their successors, and countersigned by the Secretary to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, or his successor, shall be given to the purchaser at such sale, conveying to him in fee-simple absolute the property by him purchased, which deed shall be deemed and held to give a good and perfect title to any property sold as hereby authorized.

SEC. 2. That the amount realized by any such sale as hereinbefore provided over and above the sum required to pay the amount of the certificate aforesaid and all proper costs and expenses of sale shall be paid to the owner or owners of such building, or to the person or persons representing the ownership thereof, as aforesaid, for the benefit of the person or persons by law entitled thereto; and that at any time within two years from the date of sale the owner or owners of any property sold in conformity with the provisions of this act shall have the right to redeem the property so sold by paying the amount of the purchase money, and all taxes or other public charges against said property that may have been paid thereon by the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, or that may have become due and remain unpaid, between said day of sale and the day of such redemption, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum on such purchase money, taxes, and charges, and also the full value of any improvements which may have been made or erected on such property by said purchaser, his heirs or assigns, while the same was in his or their possession: Provided, however, That minors and other persons under legal disability shall be allowed one year after coming of age or having such disability removed to redeem such property as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. That on the collection, by sale as aforesaid or otherwise, of the cost of erecting any such appliances as aforesaid the same shall, by said commissioners or their successors, be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the District of Columbia and the fund from which the same shall have originally been paid as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 4. That in all hotels, factories, manufactories, workshops, schools, seminaries, colleges, hospitals, asylums, halls, or places of amusements, or other places mentioned in this act, the hall-ways and stair-ways shall be properly lighted when occupied at night; and at the head and foot of each flight of stairs, and at the intersection of all hall-ways with the main corridors, and at each exit to fire-escapes provided for in this act, shall be kept during the night, a red light. One or more proper alarms or gongs, capable of being heard throughout the building, shall always remain easy of access and ready for use in each of said buildings to give notice to the inmates in case of fire; and there shall be kept posted in a conspicuous place in every sleeping-room a notice descriptive of such means of escape. That all doors leading out of buildings used for places of amusement, where large crowds congregate, shall open outward. That the inspector of buildings and chief engineer of the fire department shall have the right to designate the location of said fire-escapes and stand-pipes in conformity with this act, and shall grant certificates of approval to every person, firm, corporation, trustee and board of school trustees complying with the requirements of this act, which certificate shall relieve the party or parties from the liabilities of fines or damages imposed by this act.

SEC. 5. That in case of fire occurring in any such building not provided with said appliances as may be required by the inspector of buildings and chief of engineers of the fire department in the District of Columbia, and in accordance with the requirements of the second section of this act, the person, persons, trustee, trustees, corporations, or school directors who or which neglected to provide such building with said appliances as aforesaid, shall be liable in an action for damages in case of death or personal injury being caused in consequence of such fire breaking out in said building; and such actions may be maintained by any person or persons now authorized by law to sue, as in other cases, for injuries caused by neglect of duty.

SEC. 6. That the act entitled "An act for the further protection of property from fire and safety of lives in the District of Columbia," approved January 26, 1887, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I send to the desk an amendment intended to correct an error in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, section 5, strike out the word "second," and insert "first;" so that the clause will read, "and in accordance with the requirements of the first section of this act."

The amendment was agreed to,

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC DRUNKENNESS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 9769) to punish public drunkenness in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who shall be found intoxicated upon any street, or highway, or in any public place in the District of Columbia shall pay a fine not exceeding $20, or be imprisoned for not more than twenty days, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 4 after the word "street" insert "alley."

After the word "shall" in line 5 insert "upon conviction."

At the end of the bill add, "but convicts under this act shall not be put to work upon the public streets in prison garb."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

F. H. BATES.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the consideration of business reported from the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. MCCREARY in the chair.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 8272) to provide for the payment of F. H. Bates as military instructor at the Washington High School, District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay to F. H. Bates the sum of $300, in full for his services as military instructor at the Washington High School in the District of Columbia, for the school term ending in June, 1884, one-half of said sum to be paid from the funds of the District of Columbia and the other from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] will give us some explanation of this bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. According to our information, which I have no doubt is correct, this gentleman presented this claim some years ago; and it passed the House at one time, the Senate at another time. He had an idea that whenever you start a bill in Congress it goes through of its own motion. He has since learned that such is not the case. There is no doubt that this man performed the work, and that he has not been paid.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS AGAINST CERTAIN LOTS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (S. 2307) to correct the records of the District of Columbia relative to certain real estate therein.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to remove from the records of the District all evidence of indebtedness against lot G and part of lot F, in square 226, in the city of Washington, D. C., so far as the said indebtedness relates to special assessment against said lots levied in the year 1870 for special improvements along Pennsylvania avenue northwest; the owners of the said lots to give bond in double the sum of said assessment to indemnify the District against any loss in consequence of the operations of this act.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

INDUSTRIAL HOME SCHOOL.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 7083) to regulate the powers and duties of the board of trustees of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia in respect to infant wards and scholars, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when a guardian or parent of an infant shall, by an instrument in writing duly signed, executed, and acknowledged before a notary public of the District of Columbia or the clerk of the supreme court of said District, surrender said infant to the custody of the board of trustees of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia, the said undertaking shall be binding upon said parent or guardian for the time named in said undertaking as the time during which the said infant is to remain in the custody of the said board.

SEC. 2. That upon application or consent of the president of the said board of managers of the Industrial Home School of the District of Columbia, the supreme court of the District of Columbia may appoint the said corporation to be the guardian of an infant ward, and the said corporation may take and exercise said guardianship so far as relates to the person of such ward to the same extent and under the same obligations and conditions as is now provided by law in the case of natural persons.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia were read, as follows:

In line 5, strike out "an infant ward" and insert "the person of any infant inmate of said school."

After the word "guardianship," in line 7, strike out "so far as relates to the person of such ward."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GERMAN LUTHERAN TRINITY CONGREGATION.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (S. 1727) to grant to the trustees of the German Lutheran Trinity Congregation of Washington, D. C., the right to sell a portion of their cemetery lands.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the trustees of the German Lutheran Trinity Congregation in the city of Washington, D. C., be, and they are hereby, empowered to convey in fee-simple that portion of their cemetery grounds in said District, comprising 2 acres and 38½ perches of ground, and more fully described in a certain deed of trust by Jacob Huster and wife to George Emmert, bearing date the 19th day of March, A. D. 1881, and recorded March 22, A. D. 1881, in liber numbered 964, folio 341 et sequentes, one of the land records for the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from and after its passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 9977) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend a side-track into square No. 1025 in the city of Washington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company is hereby granted permission to extend a side-track from the main line of its track, in the city of Washington, into square No. 1025, between Twelfth and Thirteenth streets and M and N streets southeast, under such conditions and regulations as may be imposed by the commissioners of the District of Columbia for the protection of the public in the use of streets affected and otherwise.

Mr. BLAND. As this bill appears to affect the streets occupied by railroads entering this city, I desire to know whether the passage of the bill will interfere with the proposition to remove the present depots. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. HEARD) was read, as follows:

The company merely desires to run a side-track from the line of its road into square No. 1025. The proposed track will leave the line of the road on the lands owned by said railroad company, cross one street, which will not interfere with the rights of public travel, and enter square No. 1025, with the consent and at the request of the owners of said square.

A subcommittee of your committee has made a personal inspection of the premises, and can see no objection to granting the authority asked for. The right granted is to be exercised under such conditions and regulations as may be imposed by the commissioners of the District.

Your committee report the bill back to the House, and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to have some explanation in regard to this matter.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD], who is familiar with the facts.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] and myself, at the request of our committee, made a personal investigation of this ground. It is down under the bluffs on this side of the Congressional Cemetery, and just at the mouth of the tunnel through which the Baltimore and Potomac goes on towards the Eastern Branch, and on this side. The railroad goes through a cut perhaps 25 feet in depth; and the proposition is to grant an extension or spur of the road to go off on their own right of way to a square that belongs to the Washington and Georgetown Gas Company, which is building at this place some very extensive works, at a cost of some $400,000, right under the bluff. This gives the railroad company the right of way to reach this square where the works are located. It is a matter of mutual convenience to the railroad company and the gas company; it interferes with nobody's rights, and meets with the approval of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CLOSING OF ALLEYS, SQUARE 132, WASHINGTON.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now call up the bill (S. 1612) to provide for the closing of parts of two alleys in square 132, in the city of Washington, D. C., and for the relief of Charles Early and Corbin Warwick.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and instructed, on the petition of all the owners of property abutting on those parts of the two 10-feet wide alleys running east and west through square 132, in the city of Washington, D. C., for a distance of 96.04 feet, beginning at, and running east, from the east side of Nineteenth street (being that portion lying between lots 161 and 162 and 169 and 170, in the subdivision placed on record in the surveyor's office in the District of Columbia, in book 15, page 27), to declare said parts of said 10-feet wide alleys closed: Provided, That the owners of the land abutting on that portion of said alleys to be closed in said square shall, as a condition precedent to such action on the part of the commissioners, file in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia a plat to be approved by the commissioners, dedicating to the use of the public, as a public alley, an area of ground equal to the area of the parts of alley-ways declared to be closed, and sufficient for the purpose of connecting said alleys with, and making an outlet to T street and S street at least 10 feet wide.

SEC. 2. That the owners of the property abutting on the portion of said alleys which may be closed as aforesaid shall be held to have acquired all the right and title of the District of Columbia, or the city of Washington, in and to the portion of the alleys which may be closed under the provisions of the first section of this act, and which may be included within the extension of their several bounds to the lines of the new alley.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALLEY, SQUARE NO. 493.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now call up the bill (H. R. 7864) to reappropriate to pay for alley condemned in square No. 493.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, That of the surplus that has been covered into the Treasury of the sum appropriated by the act approved June 30, 1880, entitled, "An act making appropriations for the District of Columbia for the year ending June 30, 1881," for amount due property owners for ground condemned and used for alleys, there be, and the same is hereby, reappropriated so much as will be sufficient to pay, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from August 6, 1870, to the date of the approval of this act, the persons entitled to the amount awarded by the jury of condemnation for the land taken for an alley through square No. 493, in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAPITOL, NORTH O STREET, ETC., RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now call up the bill (H. R. 10758) to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company is hereby authorized to extend its tracks and run its cars thereon through and along the following-named street: Beginning at Fourteenth and B streets southwest, east along B street southwest to Twelfth street southwest, to an intersection with its present line on said Twelfth street.

SEC. 2. That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company," approved March 3, 1881, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of the construction of said extension, the erection of machine and carpenter shops and additional stables said Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company is hereby authorized to increase its capital stock in a sum not exceeding $50,000.

SEC. 4 3. That unless said extension is completed and the cars run thereon within six months from the passage and approval of this act, the authority herein granted shall be void.

The committee recommended the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out section 3 of the bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I would like to have the report read in connection with this bill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] who is thoroughly familiar with this subject, to make a statement, which I think will meet the wishes of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ROWELL. This bill is simply to authorize the connection of the Belt Line Railroad across two blocks down in Southwest Washington.

Mr. ADAMS. How far?

Mr. ROWELL. Just two blocks. They have a little 2-cent line that runs down in that portion of the city, and they propose to connect the end of that line with the main line, so that passengers for one fare may ride over the entire length of the route.

Mr. ADAMS. What provision of law is repealed by this bill?

Mr. ROWELL. We do not repeal any.

Mr. ADAMS. There is a section of this bill which repeals some law; section 2, I think.

Mr. HEMPHILL. We recommend that section 3 be stricken out.

Mr. ADAMS. I know; but there is a section which repeals some law to which reference is made; section 2, I think, of the bill.

Mr. ROWELL. I do not recollect exactly the language of the law incorporating the company that is stricken out; but it necessarily has reference to the point that this bill is intended to reach.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I understand the gentleman to say that this is in the lower part of the city, and is to connect the little 2-cent line with the main line.

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, that is the object.

Mr. CANNON. I have no desire to object to the consideration or passage of this bill, but simply rise to ask, although I suppose there is nothing in this bill which will permit it, whether steps have been taken by the committee to incorporate a company, or to bring the present companies under the operation of a law so as to secure or compel them to use some new method for the propulsion of street cars, either by electricity or the cable system, so that we can have in this city the same advantages in that respect that other communities are permitted to enjoy?

Mr. ROWELL. I will say to my colleague that we have already reported a bill authorizing the incorporation of a company with new motors. One of the objects of the bill is also to compel other companies to adopt that method. The reason it has not been brought forward is that it takes two or three days with the antagonisms which such measures meet to get it through the House, and we have not had the time.

Mr. CANNON. We have power to so amend existing charters, as I understand it, so as to compel them to use other motors.

Mr. ROWELL. I think so.

Mr. CANNON. I would desire or rather express the hope of seeing some time when the committee would recommend such legislation; and as a member of the House I would vote to give the committee three or four days if necessary to consider such a bill.

Mr. HEARD. We have recommended such a bill as this, and it is now on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BLAND. Before the bill is laid aside, I wish to ask a question: whether in these charters there is a recognition of the right of Congress to alter or repeal the law?

Mr. HEARD. In every one of them that condition is embodied. Congress has the right to alter or repeal.

Mr. BLAND. Because there was a bill passed a few moments ago in regard to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad which did not contain such a provision.

Mr. ROWELL. That is another thing; that is not a street railroad.

Mr. BLAND. It is just the same, and the same principle ought to apply. This reservation should be embodied in all of these bills.

Mr. HEARD. I have no objection to putting it in when it comes before the House.

Mr. BLAND. I hope when that bill is reported to the House the amendment will be made providing that Congress shall have the right to alter, amend, or repeal the law.

Mr. ROWELL. In this bill that right already exists.

Mr. BLAND. I am speaking of another bill. I refer to that bill passed a few moments ago in reference to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad.

Mr. GAY. Does that company run one-horse or two-horse cars on that line?

Several MEMBERS. One-horse cars.

Mr. ROWELL. This is the Belt-Line road.

Mr. GAY. I want to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

That this privilege be granted on the condition that all cars shall carry a conductor to collect fares.

Mr. GAY. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the privilege of these companies in this city is wonderfully abused by the use of cars in which passengers are made collectors of fares, and I hope that this line is sufficiently remunerative to enable the company to use conductors on every car. I think that with these privileges ought to be incorporated a provision that they should be required to have a conductor on the cars to collect fares.

Mr. ROWELL. I hope that this little amendment to the charter of the Belt Line will not be prevented by the incorporation of that amendment. This is really very largely in the interest of the public. It is made to cut out this little 2-cent line that runs down and stops, and to enable that to be made part of the main line by connecting across two blocks so that the public will get the privilege of riding over all this Belt Line at one fare instead of having to pay an additional 2 cents fare on this short line. It is in a section where the travel is light, and where they use one-horse cars. To oblige them to put conductors on their cars would be to add considerably to their expenses; and to pass this amendment would be simply to prevent their building that little line, which the public are more interested in than the company.

Mr. WILKINS. Where is it?

Mr. ROWELL. It is in the southwest, in the neighborhood of the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. It is demanded more by the public than by the railroad company.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the committee rise and report the various bills to the House.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar having had under consideration sundry bills, they had directed him to report them back with various recommendations.

BILLS PASSED.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 8272) to provide for the payment of F. H. Bates as military instructor at the Washington High School, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH, of Wisconsin. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was again read.

The question recurred on the engrossment and third reading of the bill; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 2307) to correct the records of the District of Columbia relative to certain real estate therein.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 7083) to regulate the powers of the trustees of the Industrial Home School, in the District of Columbia, in respect to infant wards and scholars, and for other purposes.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (S. 1727) granting to the trustees of the German Lutheran Trinity Congregation, of the District of Columbia, the right to sell a portion of their cemetery land.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 9977) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend a side track into square 1025, in the city of Washington.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert the following as a new section:

"SEC. 2. The right of Congress to alter, amend, or repeal the franchises herein granted is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] incorporated in the bill. It is the practice of the committee to incorporate such a provision in similar bills, but there was an omission in this instance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (S. 1612) to provide for the closing of parts of two alleys in square 1327, in the city of Washington, and for the relief of Charles Early and Coburn Warwick.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 7864) to reappropriate to pay for an alley condemned in square 493, in the city of Washington.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 10758) to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railroad Company.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the several votes by which the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House were passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before putting that motion to the House the Chair will submit to the House certain personal requests.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COX, for ten days.

To Mr. DAVIDSON, of Alabama, until August 15, on account of important business.

To Mr. CROUSE, for six days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SCOTT, indefinitely.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills relating to the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering such bills as may be called up by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ATTENDANTS IN INSANE ASYLUM, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 7785) for the relief of attendants on the insane at the Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia, which has been reported from the committee with amendments.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the pay of the attendants on the insane at the Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia shall be $60 per month, including board, and when living in the hospital that a day's labor in said hospital shall consist of eight hours.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out in line 4, 5, 6, and 7 the words "Sixty dollars per month, including board, and when living in the hospital that a day's labor in said hospital shall consist of eight hours," and insert: "Divided into three classes; the first class shall receive $45 per month, the second class $35 per month, and the third class $25 per month, including board; and the eight-hour law shall not apply to the services of these attendants."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ATKINSON. I send up an amendment which is merely verbal.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 3 strike out "the pay of."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the committee now rise and report that bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. HATCH having taken the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7785) for the relief of the attendants on the insane at the Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia, and had instructed him to report it to the House with amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHURCH OF THE ASCENSION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 3004) for the relief of the Church of the Ascension, in the District of Columbia, and I ask unanimous consent that the committee be allowed at this time to report a substitute for the bill.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, as a substitute for House bill 3004, the bill (H. R. 10926) for the relief of the Church of the Ascension in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent that the bill just reported as a substitute be now considered.

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all taxes and assessments together with the interest and penalties now due and unpaid for the years 1873, 1874, 1875, upon lots 1, 2, and 3, in square 282, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, now owned and occupied by the Church of the Ascension, be, and the same are hereby, remitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of this bill.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I will ask the chairman of the committee whether any other churches are in a like situation with this one in this respect?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know that there is any other church in exactly the same situation. Other churches have applied to the committee, and we have made liberal allowances in such cases.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I was talking with the pastor of another church the other day, and he said that there were some charges of this kind against his church and wanted to know whether they were to be remitted.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not know whether we have taken any action as to the church to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] refers, but I do know that we have been quite liberal in this direction and have reported several such bills as this.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. But the committee have reported no general bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill H. R. 3004 was, by unanimous consent, laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the purpose of taking up House bill 6264 and other bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering bills called up by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON AND HIGHLANDS STREET RAILWAY.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 6264) to incorporate the Washington and Highlands Street Railway Company of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ATKINSON. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Let the bill be read by sections for amendment. The object of the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ATKINSON] is merely to save time.

Mr. BLOUNT withdrew his objection; and, by unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The Clerk read section 1, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Frank Hume, S. Taylor Suit, William A. Gordon, L. G. Hine, and John F. Waggaman, and their associates and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body corporate under the name of "The Washington and Highland Street Railroad Company of Washington, District of Columbia," with power to sue and subject to being sued, to plead and being impleaded, and cause to be made for the use of the said company a seal, and the same to change at pleasure, with authority to construct and lay down a single or double track railway, with the necessary switches and turn-outs, in the county of Washington, District of Columbia, through and along the following road: Commencing at the intersection of Boundary, H street, Maryland avenue, Fifteenth street, and Benning's road; thence eastwardly over the Bladensburgh road to the District line, with the right to run public carriages thereon, drawn by horse or other power, except steam, receiving a rate of fare not exceeding 10 cents a passenger for any distance on said road: Provided, That whenever the foregoing route may coincide with any other duly incorporated street railroad company in the District of Columbia, or connect portions of such route, but one set of tracks shall be used by both companies, which are hereby authorized and empowered to use such tracks in common, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event the said companies fail to agree upon satisfactory terms, either of said companies may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall provide for proper notice to and hearing of all parties interested, and shall have power to determine the terms and conditions upon which and the regulations under which the company hereby incorporated shall be entitled so to use and enjoy the track of such other street railway company, and the amount and manner of compensation to be paid therefor: And provided further, That neither of the companies using such track in common shall be permitted to make the track so used in common the depot or general stopping place to await passengers, but shall only be entitled to use the same for the ordinary halts for the taking up and dropping of passengers.

The committee recommended the following amendments:

Section 1, line 8, strike out "being" and insert "be."

Section 1, lines 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, and 40, strike out the following: "And provided further, That neither of the companies using such track in common shall be permitted to make the track so used in common the depot or general stopping place to await passengers, but shall only be entitled to use the same for the ordinary halts for the taking up and dropping of passengers."

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the road of said company, with all its property and franchises, shall be liable to taxation as is or may be provided by law, and their cars or vehicles be subject to the provisions of such laws as to license and fees therefor.

SEC. 3. That the said railway shall be laid as near the center of the Bladensburgh road as practicable.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out, in section 3, the words "as near the center of" and insert "on."

Strike out the words "as practicable" and insert "outside of the traveled track of said road."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the said corporation hereby created shall be bound to keep said tracks, and the space of 2 feet beyond the outer rails thereof, and also the space beyond the tracks, at all times well paved and in good order, in such manner and with such material as may be directed by the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia, and if there be at any time no such board, then by the Secretary of War, without expense to the United States or said city; that when any street through which the said railway runs shall be paved, said railway company shall bear all of the expenses for that portion of the work lying between the exterior rails of the track of said road, and for a distance of 2 feet from the exterior of such track or tracks on each side thereof, and of keeping the same in repair; but the said railway company, having conformed to the grades established by the commissioners, may use such cobble-stones or Belgian blocks for paving their tracks, or the space between their tracks, as the commissioners may direct.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

After the word "thereof," in line 3, strike out "and also the space beyond the tracks."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That whenever the said company, in the construction of its railroad as authorized by this act, shall find it necessary to cross or intersect any established road, street, or other way, it shall be the duty of said company so to construct the said railroad across such established road, street, or other way as not to impede the passage or transportation of persons or property along the same; and where it shall be necessary to pass the said railroad through the land of any individual within the said District it shall be the duty of said company to provide for such individual wagon-ways across the said railroad as may be necessary and proper from one part of his land to another; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the said company to enter upon any lot or square, or part thereof, owned by the United States, within the limits of the city of Washington, for the purpose of locating or constructing the said railroad or for the purpose of excavating the same or taking therefrom any materials, or for any other purposes and uses whatsoever; and the said Washington and Highlands Street Railroad Company may connect within said District with any street railroad company chartered, or hereafter to be chartered, by such route or routes within said District as may be hereafter determined by Congress, and upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the said companies, respectively, or as may be prescribed by Congress.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall prevent the Government or the proper authorities of the District of Columbia, at any time, at its option, from altering the grade or otherwise improving all streets and roads occupied by said railway, or the said District from so altering and improving such streets and roads and sewerage thereof as may be under their respective authority or control, and in such event it shall be the duty of said company, at its own expense, to change the said railway so as to conform to such grade and pavement.

SEC. 7. That the capital stock of said company shall not be less than $50,000 nor more than $100,000, and the said stock shall be divided into shares of $100 each, and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct.

SEC. 8. That the said company shall place first-class cars on said railway, with all modern improvements for the convenience of passengers, and shall run cars thereon during the day and as late as 11 o'clock p. m.

Mr. BLAND. I offer the following amendment:

Add to section 8 the following:

"That a conductor shall be placed on each car, and not less than two-horse power shall be used in running each of said cars."

Mr. COMPTON. We are willing to accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCADOO. I move to amend by inserting after the amendment just adopted the following:

That no passenger shall be charged fare unless he or she shall be seated.

Mr. Chairman, I have drawn this amendment hastily. If I had had time I would have added a provision that no conductor or agent of this company shall take on any passenger for whom there is not a seat. I think one of the greatest outrages inflicted on the traveling public in large cities is the overcrowding of the street-cars. No company has a right to stop its cars and take on passengers when there are no seats provided for them—when the cars are already filled. There ought to be a penalty of $50 or $100 imposed every time a car is stopped for the purpose of taking on a passenger for whom there is no seat and who pays 5 cents for the privilege of hanging on a strap or brace.

Mr. COMPTON. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. While I concur in the general policy which the gentleman from New Jersey advocates, I respectfully submit to him, and to the Committee of the Whole, that in view of the fact that no such provision has been attached to the charter of any other street-car company within the limits of this District, it is hardly fair that such a requirement should be imposed upon this little corporation which at any rate will have to struggle for some time to maintain itself after it has been started.

Mr. MCADOO. If it can be agreed that this section be passed over now to be recurred to hereafter, I will withdraw my amendment, and offer it when the section is again considered.

Mr. COMPTON. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that this section be passed over for the present, with the privilege of recurring to it later. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

Mr. MACDONALD. I wish to offer the following amendment to come in after that adopted on motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND]:

And said company shall operate the cars of said railroad at and during such hours as the commissioners of the District of Columbia or other proper authorities thereof, or Congress, may prescribe.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I suggest to the gentleman to strike out the words "or other proper authorities," as they are rather indefinite.

Mr. MACDONALD. I accept the gentleman's suggestion, and modify my amendment in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD].

Mr. BREWER. I understand that the section to which the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] applies has already been passed over for the present upon the request of the gentleman from New Jersey. I suggest that action on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota be postponed until we recur to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will have to withdraw his amendment temporarily. The Committee of the Whole has agreed to pass over this section and consider it at a later period.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the said company shall provide such passenger-rooms, offices, stables, and depots at such points as the business of the road and the convenience of the public may require; and said company is hereby authorized to lay such rails through transverse streets or avenues as may be necessary, not exceeding 300 yards in distance in any one place, for connecting said stables, depots, and offices with the main tracks; and the said company is hereby authorized to purchase or lease such lands or buildings as may be necessary for the passengers and freight rooms, ticket-offices, stables, and depots above named, and not to exceed $25,000 in value.

SEC. 10. That within sixty days after the passage of and approval of this act, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any of them refuses to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause books of subscription to be opened and kept open in some convenient and accessible place or places in the city of Washington, for a period to be fixed by the said corporators, not less than two days; and the said corporators shall give public notice, by advertisement in not less than two daily papers published in the city of Washington, of the time when and place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers on said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That every subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing 5 per cent. of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer of said company. And when the books of the subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within five days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company to meet within five days thereafter for the choice of seven directors, of which public notice shall be given for two days in not less than two newspapers published daily in the city of Washington, or by written or printed personal notice to each stockholder by the secretary or clerk of said corporation, and in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, was read:

After the word "subscribing," in line 14, strike out "five" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 11 and 12 of the bill were read.

Section 13 was read, as follows:

SEC. 13. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for choice of directors, to be holden at such times and place, and under such conditions and upon such notice, as the said company in their by-laws prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report of their doings to the stockholders in general meeting.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Add, at the end of the section, the words "and to the commissioners of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was adopted.

Section 14 was read, as follows:

SEC. 14. That if any person or persons shall willfully or unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage of the cars of said railway, or destroy or injure the cars, depots, stations, or other property belonging to said railway, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense the sum of $50 to the said company, to be recovered and disposed of as other fines and penalties in said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage sustained by his, her, or their act as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within sixty days after such offense shall have been committed.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Amend line 6 to read: "A sum not exceeding $50;" so that the paragraph will read:

"The person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense a sum not exceeding $50, to be recovered," etc.

The amendment was adopted.

Section 15 was read, as follows:

SEC. 15. That unless the said corporators shall commence work within six months and complete their said railway to the city limits within three years from and after the passage of this act, then this act shall be null and void, and no rights whatever shall be acquired under it.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

In line 2, strike out "six" and insert "three."
In line 3, strike out "three" and insert "two."

The amendments were adopted.

Section 16 was read.

Section 17 was read, as follows:

SEC. 17. That said company shall make such reports of expenditures, earnings, or otherwise to the authorities of the Government as may be required by law.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Amend the section so that it will read as follows:

SEC. 17. That said company shall make full reports of expenditures and earnings annually to Congress.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. LYNCH. I move a further amendment to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "Congress:"

"And that whenever the net income shall exceed 10 per cent. of the amount of the capital stock paid in actual cash, one-half of such excess of income shall be equally divided between said company and the District of Columbia."

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, the House committee undertook to provide for the taxation of these railroads in that way by directing that they should pay the balance of their gross incomes, after a certain percentage was paid to the stockholders, into the treasury of the District. But after consideration and further consultation with the members of the Senate, who had been considering bills upon which a similar provision has been attached by the House, the committee of the House receded, and the House agreed with them; because if the company makes more than a reasonable sum the people of the District ought to have the benefit of it by a reduction in the price of fare; and I believe it is provided in this bill that such shall be the case. If not, it is a provision that ought to be here, and I shall offer such an amendment so that the fares to be paid by passengers shall be subject to the control of the commissioners of the District of Columbia. In that event, if the company makes more than a reasonable income, the proper way and the fairest way to get at it is to reduce the fare; and that law is expected to apply to all the railroads in the District. It is fair that they ought to be treated in the same way.

Mr. WARNER. Is that provision in this bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. If it is not, I will move an amendment to put it in. I will offer that amendment now; that is to say, that the rate of fare shall be subject to the control of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and that, I think, ought to satisfy the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPINOLA. With the addition that it shall not at any time exceed 5 cents.

Mr. LYNCH. What is the objection to the provision I have suggested?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, sir, in the first place, to get at what the income of a railroad company is, is almost an impossibility. That is one of the difficulties that arises. The second is, that there ought not to be a different rule applied to this road than that which applies to any of the others. Now, as I say, the Senate committee is preparing a general bill for the taxation of all of the railroads. This road is more in the nature of a public enterprise, so far as the benefits to be conferred upon the public, or as between the railroad and the public is concerned, than any of the railroads occupying the more important portions of the city and passing through prominent thoroughfares. Those roads within the limits of the city make a great deal of money. There is no prospect of this road making any money for a long time. It is an unsettled portion of the District, and while it is a great accommodation to the people living along the proposed line of the road, it will be some time before the stockholders can hope to realize any benefit from their investment.

Mr. MCADOO. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard for a few moments on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I think the whole system of granting these special charters is unjust and wrong. What do you do in this bill? And in making these remarks I want to go on record as a general principle in opposition to this character of legislation.

What does this bill propose? Like all others, we propose to give to a number of men selected by name a special right to run a railroad through certain of the streets and avenues in the city of Washington. That is undoubtedly a very valuable privilege. When a certain number of selected men are given the right to make money in that manner, by the use of the public property and public streets of the city of Washington, there ought to be some distinct compensating advantage to the people of the District and to the public treasury in exchange for that privilege. Now, in the city of New York one of the greatest public scandals that has ever disgraced this country was the granting of the franchise for the Broadway Railroad, and every citizen knows that that great franchise, if it had been honestly disposed of, or if it had been sold at public auction, would have produced an exceedingly large sum of money to be paid into the public treasury.

For myself I do not believe that Congress ought to incorporate any set of men into a railroad company, with a special charter or special control over the public avenues or streets of the city. If there is such a public demand that in the city of Washington there is to be built a horse railroad or other railroad through any portion of the public property, the better plan, in my opinion, and the proper way would be to put that franchise up at public auction, to be disposed of on the best terms for the benefit of the people of the District and of the treasury thereof.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States are paying a very large sum of money to beautify this magnificent capital; and there seems a spirit in all local enterprises that find voice here in Congress that the same care shall not be exercised that would be the case in other cities to get from these corporations for the public franchise as much money as may be a legitimate compensation in order that the burden of taxation might be lightened in the city of Washington, and in order that the charge upon the Treasury of the United States which now goes to make up the difference between the annual expenses of the District and the tax levied here, shall not fall, as it now does, largely on the whole people of the United States.

The gentleman from South Carolina says that it will be some time before this railroad would come under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he thinks that an argument against the amendment. Now, the amendment, if adopted, would be a part of the act incorporating this company, and would not be effective until such time as the receipts of this company would bring it under this amendment and bring money into the treasury of this District.

The proper way, and the only way by which you can avoid public scandal and do justice to the citizens of this District, would be to sell by auction to the highest bidder the franchises of these great public carrying companies and gas companies, so that the public could get the benefit; and failing in that there is one remedy which you have here in Congress, and that is to fix in the charter of these great corporations a clause that the fare shall not exceed a certain amount, and then the traveling public will get the benefit of the advantages and immunities which you are granting by legislation to the men who constitute these companies.

Mr. COMPTON. A provision to limit the amount of the fare is in this bill.

Mr. MCADOO. At what figure does it fix the maximum?

Mr. COMPTON. At 10 cents.

Mr. MCADOO. That maximum is too high. I would like to lower the maximum.

Mr. COMPTON. I would say that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] is now preparing an amendment that will put the whole thing into the hands of the District commissioners for control.

Mr. MCADOO. That is better than nothing. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a wise one. It will give some benefit to the public for the franchises accorded to these companies, and I hope it will be approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. HATCH took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 8989) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 10233) making an appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 5903) for the relief of Lewis Davis, a soldier of the war of 1812;

An act (H. R. 5096) authorizing the construction of a bridge across Flint River, in the State of Georgia;

An act (H. R. 9816) to authorize the building of a railroad bridge at Fort Smith, Ark.;

An act (H. R. 1983) to ratify an act entitled "An act creating the county of San Juan," in the Territory of New Mexico;

An act (H. R. 1387) for the relief of certain volunteer soldiers;

An act (H. R. 4423) relating to certain acts of the Twenty-seventh Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico;

An act (H. R. 3376) to extend the limits of the port of New Orleans;

An act (H. R. 8391) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in Grant County, Indiana, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 8039) providing for the appointment of police matrons for the District of Columbia, defining their duties, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. 10328) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between Clay County and Jackson County, Missouri, at a point to be selected consistent with the interests of river navigation between Kansas City, Mo., and a point within 5 miles below said city;

An act (H. R. 474) for the relief of General G. Cluseret; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 161) to authorize the Secretary of War to issue arms and equipments to the militia of the District of Columbia.

WASHINGTON AND HIGHLANDS STREET RAILWAY.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

Mr. MACDONALD. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, to be inserted at the proper place.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

The right is reserved to alter or amend this act, and to control said company as to the rates to be charged on said railroad.

Mr. COMPTON. If the gentleman had read the bill through, he would have found a clause which gives Congress power to alter or amend the charter.

Mr. LYNCH. The only objections offered to my amendment are two. The first is that it is almost impossible to ascertain what is the income of a street railroad. I would respectfully submit to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] that that is one very good reason for the adoption of the amendment. It seems to me that there should be some power or some provision to ascertain how much should be turned into the treasury of the city. The second is that there seems to be no prospect whatever of this company making any large sum, or having much income for years to come. Now, if the amendment be adopted, the city will receive a benefit from the running of the cars and the occupancy of the streets; and the company will expend the income by supplying better facilities for the traveling public.

The amendment of Mr. LYNCH was adopted; ayes 15, noes 11.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I do not think it is necessary to offer the amendment I referred to a moment ago, and therefore I will not offer it.

This act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed, and I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota is necessary.

Mr. MACDONALD. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I offer an amendment: In section 1, after the word "steam," insert "locomotive."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the committee now recur to section 8 for the purpose of considering the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO].

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

On page 5, section 8, after the word "meridian," add the words "no fare shall be asked or demanded from any passenger except he or she shall have sufficient sitting room afforded him or her, and no car shall take on any passenger or passengers except there is sitting room for the same."

Mr. COMPTON. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. MCADOO. I think that one of the greatest inconveniences the traveling public are subjected to, especially in horse-cars in cities, is the taking up of passengers when the seating capacity of the car has been exhausted. Take one of these open summer cars. They have a certain seating capacity which is very easily determined, but I venture to say that if any number of ladies or gentlemen were to stand on the street corner and signal one of these cars, the seating capacity of which is fully occupied, the car would be stopped and these people would have to hang on the outside, but still have to pay their fare.

I did not make the amendment as strong as I think it ought to be made. I believe that there should be a penalty imposed for the stopping of cars by the agents of this company to take on passengers when they are unable to give them seats. This amendment is a very mild one. It simply provides that if a passenger is taken on the car when no seat is provided for him the conductor shall not have any right to demand the payment of fare from that passenger. Can there be any objection to that? If a person is in a great hurry and is willing to stand upon the platform or in any other part of the car, he will still be free, even with this amendment, to pay his fare if he chooses, and a man who knows this to be the law and who is in such a hurry that he prefers not to wait for another car, will be perfectly willing to pay his fare without its being demanded. On the other hand, when you say to the company, as this amendment proposes to say, that they shall not demand fare of any passenger unless they provide him a seat, you will stop this abuse. It very often happens that a car which has every seat filled comes along; it is difficult for people on the sidewalk, especially on the broad avenues of this city, to tell whether the car is full or not, and when they signal the conductor he stops the car and takes them on, although he knows that he has no seats for them. In other words, he takes those passengers under false pretenses. As I have said, you can not always tell from the sidewalk whether a car is full or not. It may be a lady who can not afford to stand up, and when the conductor of a car which is already filled stops that car and takes on such a passenger, or any passenger, he obtains that passenger under a false pretense. Now, if you adopt this amendment the conductors will not take people on board their cars unless they can furnish them with seats.

Mr. BREWER. Does not the lady usually go down to the track in the avenue, where she can see whether the car is full or not?

Mr. McADOO. The habits of the female sex in regard to horse-cars I have not studied very much.

Mr. BREWER. Is not that the gentleman's own practice also?

Mr. McADOO. I very frequently stand on the curb. That is my individual practice.

Mr. BREWER. Suppose you go down to the car track on the avenue, and the day is rainy, and a car comes along with all the seats filled, would not you prefer to get on that car rather than stand in the rain and wait for another?

Mr. McADOO. Yes, sir; and in that case I could pay my fare.

Mr. BREWER. Yes; the gentleman could pay his fare, but would not nine-tenths of the passengers exercise the privilege which this amendment would give them to withhold their fare?

Mr. McADOO. Then why could not a rich corporation like the Pennsylvania avenue line increase the number of its cars and run them with such frequency that no passenger would be obliged to take a crowded car?

Mr. BREWER. Can the gentleman make any complaint now that the cars on Pennsylvania avenue do not run with sufficient frequency?

Mr. McADOO. I know they are very generally overcrowded.

Mr. BREWER. But do they not run frequently enough?

Mr. McADOO. I do not know about that. I say that they are generally overcrowded. I do not want to enter into a criticism of any existing company unless I know all the facts. But I know that the cars are generally overcrowded and that if they ran more frequently they would be less crowded.

Mr. BREWER. Does the gentleman believe that preventing passengers getting on a car in which the seats are all filled would be more satisfactory to the public than the present practice of letting passengers take their chance of getting a seat?

Mr. McADOO. I do, and I will tell you why. The adoption of such a rule would compel the company to run more cars and to run them more frequently. That would be the result of prohibiting the conductors from overcrowding their cars.

Mr. COMPTON. How much smoke a little fire makes! A few years ago we had the great New York Broadway street railroad steal, and gentlemen who are proposing these amendments here must have that in their minds. Here is a bill to authorize the construction of a little road, about 4 miles in length, from the extreme northeastern section of the city out through a sparsely settled country, as a convenience for the few people who happen to reside along its line and at its terminus, an enterprise which under any circumstances will have to struggle to maintain itself at all, and here are propositions to load it down with a lot of amendments which if they were proposed to a line of road on Broadway, New York, or on Pennsylvania avenue in this city might have some show of reason, but which, as applied to this proposed road, are simply absurd. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey will not prevail.

The amendment of Mr. McADOO was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying this bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WARNER. Before that is done I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia a question. It is provided in this bill that the maximum fare shall not exceed 10 cents for each passenger, and it is announced that the purpose of that is to give Congress control so as to reduce the fare as soon as the earnings of the road will permit. The inquiry I wish to make is, what provision there is in the bill to ascertain the exact earnings of this road.

Mr. COMPTON. They report to Congress every year.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state to the gentleman that the bill requires that—

Mr. WARNER. That is entirely satisfactory. I was about preparing an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MACDONALD. I now ask to recur to the section that was passed over (section 8), with a view of submitting the amendment I sent to the desk some time ago.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And said company shall operate the cars on said railroad at and during such hours as the commissioners or Congress may prescribe.

Mr. BREWER. The gentleman from Minnesota, I understood, offered this as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri. I think he meant the gentleman from New Jersey; and as that amendment was voted down of course the motion is not in order. I simply call attention to the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD. I do not offer it as an amendment to any amendment. I offer it as a part of the section under consideration, but understood the proper place would be to follow that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands this is an amendment to the eighth section.

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes, sir.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 20, noes 3.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if there is anything in this bill that prescribes the form of or the matter to be embraced in the annual report to Congress?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The bill prescribes that the company shall make such reports of expenditures, earnings, etc., annually to Congress. It is the report that is required of all companies of this kind.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. That is satisfactory to me.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGETOWN BARGE, DOCK, ELEVATOR, AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I now call up the bill (H. R. 9581) to incorporate the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator, and Railway Company; and I ask unanimous consent to substitute for the House bill the bill of the Senate, No. 2252, of the same title, which has been reported favorably from the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the substitution will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move to dispense with the first formal reading of the bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Clerk read section 1 of the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Anthony Hyde, William A. Gordon, Robert B. Tenney, Henry H. Dodge, Morris J. Adler, Edward L. Dent, John A. Baker, John Marbury, and Henry M. Sweeny, their associates and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body corporate under the name of the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator, and Railway Company, with authority to build and maintain a dock or docks on the Potomac River west of Rock Creek, and to receive therein, and send therefrom, barges, vessels, cargoes, and railway cars, from and to any points on the Potomac River and its tributaries and coastwise; and to construct and maintain single or double track railways in the city of Georgetown or West Washington, D. C., through and along Water street, beginning at a point on the west side of the Aqueduct Bridge, through and along said Water street to the eastern terminus of said Water street at Rock Creek, with the privilege of extending its tracks from the intersection of Water street and Washington or Thirtieth street along Washington or Thirtieth street to the Potomac River, and from the intersection of Virginia avenue and Washington or Thirtieth street along Virginia avenue to Rock Creek, with sidings, turn-outs, turn-tables, and switches necessary for the delivery of cars to warehouses and depots along said streets; and also to construct and maintain warehouses, depots, and elevators in said city of Georgetown or West Washington, with the right to receive and dispatch boats and freight of all kinds, and to run cars on said tracks, sidings, switches, turn-outs, and turn-tables, propelled by steam, horse, or electric power; and to charge and receive for the use of the docks, railway, warehouses, depots, elevators, and barges of said company, such rates as may be fixed by the directors: Provided, That when said lines coincide with the duly authorized lines of any duly incorporated street railway of the District of Columbia, said company shall lay separate and independent tracks in the original construction of the said lines whenever, in the judgment of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, it shall be deemed by them possible and practicable so to do. Whenever the foregoing route or routes may coincide with the duly authorized route or routes of any duly incorporated street railway company in the District of Columbia, either or both companies may use the same tracks, when, on account of the width of the streets, or for other sufficient reason, it shall be deemed by the commissioners of the District to be necessary; and in such case they may use such tracks in common, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event said company fail to agree upon equitable terms, either of said companies may apply, by petition, to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall hear and determine the matter in due form of law, and adjudge to the proper party the amount of compensation to be paid therefor. Said railway shall be constructed of good materials and in a substantial manner, with the rails of American manufacture and of the most approved patterns, laid upon an even surface with the pavement of the street, with the gauge to correspond with that of the Baltimore and Ohio and Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Companies, all to be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia. The tracks of said railway, the space between the tracks, and 2 feet beyond the outer rails thereof, which this franchise is intended to cover, shall be at all times kept by said corporations well paved and in good repair at its own expense and subject to the approval of the commissioners aforesaid. And if the corporation shall fail to make the necessary repairs within ten days after notice by the commissioners, the repairs shall be made by the commissioners, and the cost of such repairs be recovered by the commissioners before any court of competent jurisdiction. It shall be lawful for said corporation, its successors, or assigns, to operate its said road by steam, horse, or electric power. It shall also be lawful for said corporation, its successors, or assigns, to erect and maintain, at such convenient and suitable points along its lines as may seem most desirable to the board of directors of said corporation, and subject to the approval of the commissioners of the District, an engine-house or houses, boiler-house or houses, and all other buildings necessary for the operation of a steam, horse, or electric motor railroad. The main line of said road shall be completed within two years from the passage of this act; and if work is not commenced and prosecuted in good faith on the main line in six months after the passage of this act, then the privileges and powers granted herein to said corporation shall be void.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

In line 87, after the words "Water street," insert "under said bridge;" in line 33, after the word "directors," insert "with the approval of the commissioners of the District,"

The amendments were adopted.

Section 2 of the bill was read.

Section 3 was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in the board of directors, seven in number, who shall be stockholders of record, and who shall hold their office for one year, and until their successors are duly elected and qualified; and the directors (a majority of whom shall be a quorum) shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall be president of the company; and they also shall choose a vice-president, a secretary, and a treasurer, who shall give a bond, with surety, to said company, in such sum as the said directors may require, for the faithful discharge of his trust. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors, by the death, resignation, or otherwise of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors. The directors shall have power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper, touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, not contrary to the charter or the laws of the United States and the ordinances of the District of Columbia. There shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for election of directors, to be held at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice as the said company in their by-laws may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report, in writing, of their doings, to the stockholders. If any person or persons shall willfully, mischievously, or unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage of the cars, engines, or barges of said company with a vehicle or vehicles, or otherwise, or in any manner molest or interfere with operatives while in transit, or destroy or injure the tracks, barges, cars, or other property belonging to said company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each offense not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, to be recovered as other fines and penalties of said District, and shall remain liable, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his or her or their acts as aforesaid. The principal offices of said company shall always be situated in the city of Washington, and all books and papers relating to the business of said company shall be kept thereat and open at all times to the inspection of the stockholders. The meeting of stockholders and directors shall be held at said office. The book in which transfers of stock shall be recorded shall be closed for the purpose of such transfer thirty days before the annual election.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

After the word "aforesaid," in line 36, insert: "That the commissioners of the District shall make such reasonable regulations as may be deemed proper to prevent the said railroad company from obstructing any of the streets the tracks of said company may cross, and for the violation of said regulations the said company shall be subject to a penalty not exceeding $100, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction."

The amendment was agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 of the bill were read, as follows:

SEC. 4. That each stockholder in the said company shall be individually liable for all the debts and liabilities of said company to the amount of the par value of the stock held by such stockholder, until the same shall have been fully paid up.

SEC. 5. That the same company shall, on or before the 15th day of January of each year, make a report to Congress of the names of all the stockholders therein, and the amount of stock held by each, together with a detailed statement of the receipts and expenditures from whatever source, and on whatever account, for the preceding year ending December 31, which report shall be verified by the affidavit of the president and secretary of the company, and if said report is not made at the time specified, or within ten days thereafter, it shall be the duty of the commissioners to cause proceedings to be instituted to forfeit this charter; and said company shall pay to the District of Columbia, as taxes for each year, 4 per cent. of its gross earnings for the preceding year, as shown by said verified statement, which amount shall be payable to the collector of taxes at the times and in the manner that other taxes are now due and payable, and subject to the same penalties on arrears; and the franchise and property of said company, both real and personal, to a sufficient amount, may be seized and sold in satisfaction thereof as now provided by law for the sale of other property for taxes; and said per cent. of its gross earnings shall be in lieu of all other assessments of taxes of whatsoever character upon its personal property, including its docks and barges, cars, and motive power, but the real estate of the company may be taxed as other real estate in the District: Provided, That the tracks of the company shall not be taxed as real estate.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment to section 5:

In line 13, after the word "year," strike out "four" and insert "five."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MCADOO. I offer a further amendment to come in after section 5 as a new section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as section 6:

That the water front at the end of all public streets and highways shall be and remain the property of the District of Columbia, and all obstructions to the water from the same may be at any time removed. Said company shall pay a rental to the District of Columbia as may be fixed by the District commissioners for the use of such lands at the end of such streets and highways as they may occupy and use.

Mr. MCADOO. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Let that be again reported; I did not catch the reading of it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have no objection to that if the District of Columbia owns the lands already, but I do not understand that because we have the right to control the streets that thereby we have the right to control the water front or that it is vested in the District. I do not know any law that settles the matter.

Mr. MCADOO. The language of the amendment is that "it shall be and remain the property;" so that if it is not already the property of the District this does not affect it.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But if it does not belong to the District how are we to legislate it into the hands of the District?

Mr. MCADOO. We are passing now very important legislation——

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state that I have no objection, if this is the property of the District, to inserting a provision that it shall remain the property of the District; but I am not willing to declare that certain pieces of property shall be and remain the property of the District without examining in detail the title to know whether it be such or not. If I understand the object of the gentleman from New Jersey, it can be accomplished by inserting a provision that all property now belonging to the District of the kind he specifies shall still remain its property. I agree with him in that respect.

Mr. MCADOO. I think I can put the amendment in such shape by accepting the suggestion of the gentleman that it will meet his views.

Mr. WARNER. Before leaving section 5, I wish to offer an amendment to it. This, I understand, proposes a new section, 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is preparing his amendment, and the gentleman from Missouri can propose his at this time.

Mr. WARNER. I move to strike out the words in line 19, "to a sufficient amount;" so that it will read:

And the franchise and property of said company, both real and personal, may be seized and sold.

It will be seen that this provision would involve the officer in unnecessary liabilities upon his bond, if he seizes or sells more property than is really necessary to satisfy the judgment for delinquent taxes. Why not leave it as in all other cases?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MCADOO. I send to the desk my amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of section 6:

"That the water front at the end of all public streets and highways shall be and remain open to the use of the public. Said company shall pay a rental to the District of Columbia as may be fixed by the District commissioners for the use of such land at the end of such streets or highways as they may occupy and use."

Mr. MCADOO. Probably I had better make some explanation of this amendment. In all the large cities of this country, especially in the largest city of my district, it has been a crying evil that the water-front at the end of the streets and highways has been absorbed by legislation to the use of great corporations, whereby the people are debarred from access to the water at the end of these streets. The public highways of these cities extend by charter or legal right to low-water mark; and the citizens have a right at all times to free access by means of the public streets to the water. The evil now complained of in many places, and which I seek to guard against in the incorporation of this company, is that by special charters or privileges great corporations have, in many of our cities—in my own city, for instance, and as I am informed by a gentleman on my right in a large city of the West—obtained possession of what belongs properly to the people; so that when the citizens go to the water end of a street they find there a wall inclosing the dock or other private property of a steam-ship or railroad company.

I desire that when we are giving these privileges to this dock and barge company, the citizens of this District shall not be debarred from free access by means of the public highways to the navigable waters of the Potomac River. I wish it to appear clearly in this act that the District of Columbia or the people thereof have not parted with any right which will debar them from access to the waters of the river. I further desire that when this barge company is allowed to occupy the end of a street with a dock or a railroad or other structure, such as the bill contemplates, the District of Columbia or the public shall not be prevented from removing the same if it should become a nuisance.

My amendment also provides that the treasury of the District shall receive a rental, to be paid by this company as compensation for the benefits which it is to enjoy under this act.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I appreciate the motive of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO]; but I think he does not undertake its accomplishment in the right way. This bill does not provide that this company shall take any part of the property belonging to the District of Columbia. The streets of any city, as I understand the law, do not belong to the city; the city has only a certain easement in them, while the title is vested elsewhere. I do not know how the case may be in this city; but that, as I understand, is the law generally all over the country with reference to public highways.

This bill provides distinctly that the rates of charge for the docks, railway, warehouses, depots, and elevators of the company shall be fixed by the directors, with the approval of the commissioners of the District of Columbia. In other words, they can not impose a cent of charge for any work they may do except with the approbation of the District commissioners. This, it seems to me, is a sufficient protection for the people.

More than that, section 6 provides that "this act may at any time be altered, amended or repealed by the Congress of the United States." So that this company does not acquire any rights which may not at any time be withdrawn should their exercise become a nuisance, which the gentleman from New Jersey has intimated may happen.

It seems to me the two provisions of this bill which I have cited guard sufficiently the public rights. The trouble with the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey is that it declares that certain property shall be and remain the property of the District of Columbia, when as a matter of fact it is very doubtful whether the District has any property rights in the matter at this time. It seems to be unjust to declare that this property shall be the property of the District of Columbia unless we know that it is so in fact. Such a provision if adopted would be nugatory. I trust the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey will not be agreed to.

Mr. MCADOO. In the first place, I think the measure should provide that these facilities belonging to the people shall remain open to the public use. They are not the property of the District of Columbia, but the public right. The city, or District, or any legislative authority may control as to the use, but the right is in the people, and my amendment simply says that the public right to go on the public highway to the water shall remain open to the public, and that no corporation shall bar it with a gate, or with a wall, but that the right shall always remain inviolate. The gentleman says that the bill has the usual provision that Congress may alter, amend, or repeal. My experience in one of the older States, and in an old city of an old State, is that when you give a corporation a right like that, or when they are once firmly established on the public property, you will never be able so to amend their charter as to get them off. The time to prevent abuse is when you accord the charter.

There is not a gentleman on this floor but knows the difficulty attending the amendment of a charter previously given to a corporation. Should a proposition be made to amend the charter, gentlemen would stand on this floor and defend it as a vested right. The proper time to prevent these abuses is when you are making the law.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think the first part of the amendment is well enough, and I have no objection to it, that the street shall remain open to the public clear down to the water; but to authorize the commissioners to collect rent from these companies when they already have the right to fix the charges, I think is giving additional power that will prove destructive to the whole matter.

Mr. MCADOO. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as section 6:

"That the water front at the end of all public streets and highways shall be and remain open to the use of the public."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved that section 6 be numbered section 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

By unanimous consent it was ordered that House bill 9581 be reported to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

The next bill (consideration of which was asked by Mr. HEMPHILL) was the bill (S. 1051) to amend an act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent that we dispense with the first reading of the bill.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. HATCH took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles with amendments, and requested a conference on said bills severally; and that the Senate had appointed Mr. VEST, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. MANDERSON as managers of said conference on the part of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 10128) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a railroad bridge by the Birmingham, Atlantic and Air-Line Railroad and Banking and Navigation Company across the Oconee River, in Laurens County, State of Georgia;

A bill (H. R. 7438) granting to the Aberdeen, Bismarck and Northwestern Railway Company the right to construct and maintain a bridge across the Missouri River, near Winona, Emmons County, Dakota;

A bill (S. 888) granting a pension to Mary A. Cutts; and

A bill (S. 734) granting a pension to James Hale.

It further announced the Senate had passed without amendments bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 8354) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a pile bridge over the Halifax River, at Daytona, Volusia County, Florida;

A bill (H. R. 9512) for the erection of a public building at Brownsville, Tex.;

A bill (H. R. 9611) to authorize the Macon, Tuscaloosa and Birmingham Railroad Company to build a bridge across the Black Warrior River in Alabama; and

A bill (H. R. 10053) to make May 30 a holiday in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had adopted a concurrent resolution to authorize the printing of matter furnished by the Bureau of Ethnology relating to researches and discoveries connected with the study of the North American Indians.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STEWART, of Vermont, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. CANDLER, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. STEWART, of Texas, indefinitely.

ASCENSION CHURCH.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, the Senate has just sent over a bill (S. 1099) for the relief of the Ascension Church. We passed a bill here this morning for the same purpose, and I would like to have the House reconsider the vote by which the House bill was passed and put the Senate bill upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks a motion to reconsider has been entered and agreed to in that case, so that what the gentleman asks can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the action of the House upon the House bill in order that we may take up and pass the Senate bill, which is of exactly similar import.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the bill indicated by him was passed, and that the Senate bill (S. 1099) for the relief of the Church of the Ascension, in the District of Columbia, be now put upon its passage. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCREARY. In what regard does the House bill differ from the Senate bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Not at all. The bills are identical.

There was no objection to the request of Mr. HEMPHILL, and it was so ordered.

The Senate bill (S. 1099) was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HEMPHILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The House bill (H. R. 10926, a substitute for H. R. 3004) was laid on the table.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RAILROAD, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session, Mr. ROGERS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the Senate bill which he was about to read when the committee rose informally, the bill (S. 1051) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, in the District of Columbia.

That the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, approved February 18, 1875, and amended March 24, 1876, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize said company to lay tracks and run cars thereon from the intersection of its tracks on M street south with Seventh street east; along Seventh street to G street south; along G street to Fourth street east; along Third street to E street south; along E street to Canal street; along Canal street to B street south; along B street south to Third street west; along Third street to Missouri avenue; along Missouri avenue to Sixth street west; along Sixth street to B street; north along B street to a point near the Center Market to be named by the commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the said company shall complete the above-mentioned tracks and run cars thereon within one year from the approval of this act; and from the intersection of its tracks on M street south with Second street west; along Second street to its tracks on Canal street: Provided, That said company shall complete the last-mentioned tracks and run cars thereon within two years from the approval of this act. The company is also authorized to extend its tracks and run cars thereon from its track at Seventh and G streets southeast herein mentioned, along G street to Seventeenth street east; along Seventeenth street to E street south; along E street to and beyond the entrance to the Congressional Cemetery at a point to be named by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, after the said streets shall have been improved.

SEC. 2. That the said company may be permitted to place or cause to be placed upon the Anacostia bridge an additional track, and the rails of both tracks shall be of such form as will offer the least obstruction to ordinary traffic, and subject to approval by the commissioners of the District of Columbia. The said company shall also construct at least a single track, with necessary switches and turn-outs, along Harrison street, in Anacostia, to the entrance to the grounds of the German Orphan Asylum, and run cars thereon within six months after laying the track mentioned on said bridge.

SEC. 3. That the said company is also authorized to extend its tracks and run cars thereon from its present terminus on Nichols avenue, near Anacostia, by the way of Nichols avenue to the entrance to the grounds of the Government Hospital for the Insane, and along said avenue and the Livingstone road to the District line.

SEC. 4. That should any part of the track extension herein authorized coincide with portions of any other duly incorporated street railway in the District of Columbia, but one set of tracks shall be used when, on account of the width of the street, or for other sufficient reason, it shall be deemed necessary by the commissioners of the District; and the relative conditions of use and of chartered rights may be adjusted upon terms to be mutually agreed upon between the companies, or, in case of disagreement, by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, on petition filed therein by either party, and on such notice to the other party as the court may order.

SEC. 5. That in the construction of tracks herein specified the pattern of rail used shall be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and in any extensive repairs to the tracks now owned by the company requiring new rails the pattern of rails shall likewise be approved by the commissioners of the District of Columbia: Provided, That all rails laid upon the streets of the city of Washington by said company shall be on a level with the surface of the streets and shall not project above the same.

SEC. 6. That the company shall place cars of the best construction on said railway, with all modern improvements necessary to the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon as often as the public convenience may require, in accordance with a time-table or schedule adopted by the company, a copy of which shall be filed with the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and be approved by them.

SEC. 7. That the said Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company shall, on or before the 15th day of January of each year, make a report to Congress of the names of all the stockholders therein and the amount of stock held by each, together with a detailed statement of the receipts and expenditures from whatever source and on whatever account, for the preceding year ending December the 31st, which report shall be verified by affidavit of the president and secretary of said company; and said company shall pay to the District of Columbia, in lieu of taxes upon personal property, including cars, tracks, and motive power for the next ensuing year, 2 per cent. for the first ten years after completion, and thereafter 4 per cent. of its gross earnings upon traffic for the preceding year as shown by said verified statement, which amount shall be payable to the collector of taxes at the times and in the manner that other taxes are now due and payable, and subject to the same penalties on arrears; and the franchise and property of said company, both real and personal, to a sufficient amount, may be seized and sold in satisfaction thereof, as now provided by law for the sale of other property for taxes; and said per cent. of its gross earnings shall be in lieu of all other assessments of personal taxes upon its property used solely and exclusively in the operation and management of said railway. Its real estate shall be taxed as other real estate in the District of Columbia, and the tracks shall not be taxed as real estate: Provided, That whenever the net receipts of said company from its business upon said road shall, for any years, exceed 10 per cent. of the actual cost of such road, then the company shall, under the direction of the said commissioners, reduce the rate of passenger fare to an amount as near as the same can be approximated, so that the net receipts of said company from its business upon such road shall not exceed 10 per cent. of the actual cost for the construction, equipment, and maintenance thereof.

SEC. 8. That Congress may at any time amend, alter, or repeal this act.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BRIGHTWOOD RAILROAD COMPANY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 10480) to incorporate the Brightwood Railroad Company, of the District of Columbia, and I move to substitute for the House bill the Senate bill (S. 2742) for the same purpose.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That M. M. Parker, A. A. Thomas, C. M. Anderson, C. B. Pearson, and Joseph Paul, of the District of Columbia, and their associates, successors, and assigns, be, and they are hereby, created a body corporate and politic, under the name of the Brightwood Railway Company of the District of Columbia, and may make and use a common seal, and by that name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, with authority to construct and lay down a single or double track railway, with the necessary switches, turn-outs, and other mechanical devices, and sewer connections, necessary to operate the same by horse, cable, or electric power, in the District of Columbia, through and along Brightwood avenue, from Boundary street to the boundory-line of the District of Columbia, with the right to run public carriages thereon propelled by horse, cable, electric, or cable power. Whenever the foregoing route or routes may coincide with the duly authorized route or routes of any other duly incorporated street-railway company in the District of Columbia, both companies shall use the same tracks, upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event said companies fail to agree upon equitable terms, either of said companies may apply, by petition, to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall hear and determine the matter in due form of law, and adjudge to the proper party the amount of compensation to be paid therefor. Said corporation is authorized and empowered to propel its cars on such other lines as it shall coincide with by cable power, or such other motive power as it shall use to propel its own cars with on the routes prescribed in this act, and may repair and construct such proportions of its road as may be upon the line or route or routes of any other road thus used; and in case of any disagreement regarding such construction or repairs with any company whose line is thus used such disagreement may be heard and determined summarily upon the application of either road to any court in said District having common-law jurisdiction. Said company shall receive a rate of fare not exceeding 5 cents for each passenger for each continuous ride between all points of its line, but shall sell six tickets for 25 cents.

SEC. 2. That the said railway company shall, on or before the 15th of January of each year, make a report to Congress of the names of all the stockholders therein, and the amount of stock held by each, together with a detailed statement of the receipts and expenditures, from whatever source and on whatever account, for the preceding year ending December 31, which report shall be verified by affidavit of the president and secretary of said company; and if said report is not made at the time specified, or within ten days thereafter, it shall be the duty of the commissioners to cause to be instituted judicial proceedings to forfeit this charter; and said company shall pay to the District of Columbia, in lieu of taxes upon personal property, including cars and motive power, for each year, 4 per cent. of its gross earnings upon its traffic, which amount shall be payable to the collector of taxes at the times and in the manner that other taxes are now due and payable, and subject to the same penalties or arrears; and the franchise and property of said company, both real and personal, to a sufficient amount, may be seized and sold in satisfaction thereof, as now provided by law for the sale of other property for taxes; and said per cent. of its gross earnings shall be in lieu of all other assessments upon its personal property, used solely and exclusively in the operation and management of said railway. Its real estate shall be taxed as other real estate in the District, provided its tracks shall not be taxed as real estate.

SEC. 3. That the said railway shall be laid upon such part of the road as may be designated by the commissioners of the District, and must be constructed of good materials, and in a substantial and durable manner, with the rails of the most approved pattern, all to be approved by the commissioners of the District, laid upon an even surface with the pavement of the street, and in such a manner as to interfere with the ordinary travel as little as practicable, and the gauge to correspond with that of other city railroads.

SEC. 4. That the said corporation shall, at its own expense, keep its tracks, and for the space of 2 feet beyond the outer rails thereof and also the space between the rails and tracks well graded or paved and in good repair, so as to impede the general travel as little as possible.

SEC. 5. That in the event of a change of grade at any time of any of the streets, avenues, or roads occupied by the tracks of this corporation it shall be the duty of said company to change its said railroad so as to conform to such grade as may have been thus established at its own expense.

SEC. 6. That it shall be lawful for said corporation, its successors or assigns, with the approval of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, to make all needful and convenient trenches and excavations and sewer connections, in any of said streets or places where said corporation may have the right to construct and operate its road, and place in such trenches and excavations all needful and convenient devices and machinery for operating said railroad in the manner and by the means aforesaid; and said sewer connections shall have such traps or other devices as may be required by the commissioners of the District of Columbia; it shall also be lawful for said corporations, its successors or assigns, to erect and maintain, at such convenient and suitable points along its lines as may seem most desirable to the board of directors of the said corporation, and subject to the approval of the commissioners of the District, an engine-house or houses, boiler-house or houses, and all other buildings necessary for the successful operations of an electric or cable motor railroad.

SEC. 7. That it shall not be lawful for said corporation, its successors or assigns, to propel its cars over said railroad, or any part thereof, at a rate of speed exceeding 15 miles per hour; and for each violation of this provision said corporation, its successors or assigns, as the case may be, shall be subject to a penalty of $50, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 8. That the said railway shall be commenced within three months and completed to Brightwood within twelve months from the passage of this act; and the entire line to be completed in two years from the passage of this act.

SEC. 9. That the capital stock of said company shall not exceed, if horse-power is to be used, $60,000. If electric motor-power is to be used, the capital stock shall not exceed $102,000. If propelled by cable, the capital stock shall not exceed $204,000; that the stock shall be divided into shares of $50 each, transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct; and said company shall require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay in cash the amount by them respectively subscribed, at such times (after the first installment) and in such amounts as the board of directors may deem proper and necessary in the construction of said road; and if any stockholder shall refuse or neglect to pay any installment, as required by a resolution of the board of directors, after reasonable notice of the same, the said board of directors may sell at public auction, to the highest bidder, so many shares of his said stock as shall pay said installment; and the person who offers to purchase the least number of shares for the assessment due shall be taken as the highest bidder, and the sale shall be conducted under such general regulations as may be made in the by-laws of said company; but no stock shall be sold for less than the total assessments due and payable, or said corporation may sue and collect the same from any delinquent subscriber, in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 10. That the company shall place cars of the best construction on said railway, with all modern improvements necessary to the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon as often as the public convenience may require, in accordance with a table or schedule fixed by the company, a copy of which shall be filed with the commissioners of the District of Columbia and approved by them.

SEC. 11. That the company shall buy, lease, or construct such passenger-rooms, ticket-offices, work-shops, depots, lands, and buildings as may be necessary at such points on its line as may be approved by the commissioners of the District.

SEC. 12. That all articles of value that may be inadvertently left in any of the cars or other vehicles of the said company shall be taken to its principal depot and entered in a book of record of unclaimed goods, which book shall be open to the inspection of the public, and if said property remains unclaimed for one year the company may sell the same after five days' notice.

SEC. 13. That within thirty days after the passage of this act the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder shall cause books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened and kept open in some convenient and accessible place in the District of Columbia, from 9 o'clock in the forenoon till five o'clock in the afternoon, for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than five days (unless the whole stock shall be sooner subscribed for); and said corporators shall give public notice, by advertisement in at least two daily papers published in the city of Washington, of the time when and the place where said books shall be opened; and said subscribers upon said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders: Provided, That every subscriber shall pay, at the time of subscribing, 10 per cent. of the amount by him subscribed, to the treasurer appointed by the corporators, or his subscription shall be null and void: Provided further, That nothing shall be received in payment of the 10 per cent., at the time of subscribing, except lawful money or certified checks from any national bank. And when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed, the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder shall, within twenty days thereafter, call the first meeting of the stockholders of said company, to meet within ten days thereafter, for the choice of directors, of which public notice shall be given for five days in two newspapers published daily in the city of Washington, and by written personal notice to each stockholder by the clerk of the corporation; and in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

SEC. 14. That the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in the board of nine directors, who shall be stockholders of record, and who shall hold their office for one year, and until their successors are duly elected and qualified; and the said directors, a majority of whom shall be a quorum, shall elect one of their number president of the board, who shall also be president of the company; and they shall also choose a vice-president, a secretary, and a treasurer, the latter of whom shall give bonds with good and sufficient surety to said company in such sum as the said directors may require for the faithful discharge of his trust. In case of a vacancy in the board of directors by death, resignation, or otherwise the vacancy so occasioned shall be filled by the remaining directors.

SEC. 15. That the directors shall have the power to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company and the management of its business not contrary to this charter or to the laws of the United States and the ordinance of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 16. That there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders to choose directors, to be holden at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice as the said company in their by-laws may prescribe; and said directors shall annually make a report in writing of their doings to the stockholders.

SEC. 17. That said company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of its road-way; and if any person or persons shall willfully, mischievously, and unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage of the cars of said railway with a vehicle or vehicles, or otherwise, or in any manner molest or interfere with passengers or operatives while in transit, or destroy or injure the cars of said railway or depots or other property belonging to said railway, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for each such offense not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, to be recovered as other fines and penalties in said District, and shall also be liable to said company, in addition to said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his or her or their act as aforesaid; but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within sixty days after such offense shall have been committed.

SEC. 18. That said company shall have the right of way across such other railways as are now in operation within the limits of the lines granted by this act, and is hereby authorized to construct its said road across such other railways: Provided, That it shall not unnecessarily interrupt the travel of such other railways in such construction.

SEC. 19. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. MCADOO (before the reading of the bill was completed). Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege. I find it impossible to get copies of these bills. I have sent for this one to the document-room, but the messenger has not returned. There are some amendments that I desire to offer to the bill; and I suggest that, for the convenience of members, copies of these bills that are called up for consideration by the committee should be in the House, where members may have ready access to them.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill which has been read has just come from the Senate. The gentleman from South Carolina asked and obtained unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, and the Clerk is now reading the Senate bill. When the reading is completed the Chair will entertain the question presented by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, the Senate bill has been printed, and I will say to the gentleman that it is exactly the same as the bill which the House committee have reported to the House except that the words "or double track" are inserted, and those words I propose to ask the House to strike out.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Senate bill, I believe, does not designate the streets through which this railroad is to run. It leaves that entirely to the discretion of the incorporators. Now, Brightwood can be reached either by Seventh street or Fourteenth street or any other street that goes out in that direction.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The bill says "through and along Brightwood avenue from Boundary street to the boundary line of the District of Columbia."

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What street is that?

Mr. ROWELL. Seventh street, outside the Boundary.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MACDONALD (before the completion of the reading). Why is this Senate bill here in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Simply because we want to pass it.

Mr. MACDONALD. But how did it get in here?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It was passed by the Senate and sent over here.

Mr. MACDONALD. And it was brought in here a few moments ago?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The bill has been printed and acted upon by the committee, and we have substituted it for the House bill. It is identical with the House bill except as to the words I have indicated. The bill has been printed and acted upon by the committee.

Mr. MACDONALD. That may be all very true, but I want it understood that I do not consent to it. I do not think that charters ought to be granted in that way.

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is nothing more objectionable about reading the Senate bill than the House bill, because it is the same as the House bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. It may be or it may not. Is the gentleman willing to say that he has compared it?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I say that the subcommittee who have charge of the matter have compared it, and I make the statement on their authority that the bills are the same except in the particular I have stated.

Mr. ROWELL. I desire to say that I have compared them, word for word, and the Senate bill is exactly the same as the one reported by the House committee, with the exception that the words "double track" are inserted. That is the only difference.

Mr. MACDONALD. Has this comparison been made since the passage of the Senate bill?

Mr. ROWELL. The bills have been compared to-day by Mr. BREWER, of our committee, and myself within the last twenty minutes.

Mr. MACDONALD. How is it with reference to the amendments that the House attached to the other bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. We reported a substitute and this is the same as our substitute, with the exception of three words. The original bill was reported a great while ago from the committee. We reported a substitute for the original bill, but the same substitute was introduced in the Senate and was passed there before we passed it here.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does this bill contain the reservation of the right to control by legislation?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It contains every reservation. The substitutes were prepared with a good deal of care, and the Senate committee reported the same substitute that we did. As there seems to be some misunderstanding, I will state that the District Committee having in charge the bill introduced here reported to the House a substitute. A bill has been passed by the Senate identical with the House substitute, except that the Senate has added words allowing the company, if it sees fit, to put down a double track along the route, instead of a single track. We have compared the bill as passed by the Senate with the substitute prepared by our committee, and the two measures are identical with the exception of the four words I have indicated, which I propose to ask the House to strike out.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is the capital stock of this company required to be paid up in cash?

Mr. ROWELL. The provision is the same as in similar charters—10 per cent. cash and subsequent payments in installments.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Is there any provision in this bill which prohibits the encumbering of the road before the stock subscribed is all paid in?

Mr. HEMPHILL. You mean by issuing mortgages?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will answer the gentleman in a moment. If he wants to offer an amendment we can recur to the section.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. One other point. I see in the bill a provision for selling the stock if the subscriber fails to pay the assessment made upon it. Now, where the stock is sold in consequence of an unpaid assessment will the purchaser be required to take the stock with the necessity of paying up the full subscription——

Mr. HEMPHILL. Any one buying stock buys it with all the liabilities as well as all the privileges. He must pay whatever assessments may be afterward made upon it.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I desire to know whether this bill requires the stockholders to pay in cash the amount of their subscriptions.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I can not put my eye on the exact provision. [After a pause.] There is no authority to issue bonds at all, so far as I can see.

Mr. ROWELL. The company is not permitted to do so.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. What is the amount of stock fixed in the bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It varies according to the motive power that may be used.

SEC. 2. That the capital stock of said company shall not exceed, if horse power is to be used, $60,000. If electric-motor power is to be used, the capital stock shall not exceed $102,000. If propelled by cable the capital stock shall not exceed $204,000.

Of course if the company uses cables the cost will be very much greater than if horse power be used.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That seems to be proper enough; but I want to know whether the stockholders are required to pay for their stock in cash or whether the company may issue watered stock.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I read the language of the bill:

And said company shall require the subscribers to the capital stock to pay in cash the amount by them respectively subscribed at such times (after the first installment) and in such amounts as the board of directors may deem proper and necessary.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But suppose the board of directors should not deem it "proper and necessary" to require payment in full?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. In other words, the board might make assessments to the extent of only 30 or 50 per cent. of the capital stock.

Mr. HEMPHILL. According to the best computation we have been able to make as to the cost of constructing the road we do not allow the company to issue any more stock than will be absolutely necessary to build it. We have limited the stock to $60,000 if horse power be used; and according to the computation of the committee it will take every dollar of $60,000 to construct the road if horse power should be used, $102,000 if electric-motor power should be employed, and $204,000 if the cars should be propelled by cable. The company will be required to pay the full amount of the cost of the road, according to the best computation we have been able to make, before the road can be completed.

Mr. ROWELL. These men propose to put their money into this enterprise, not to borrow money.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Is it understood the company is forbidden to issue bonds?

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is no authority given to issue bonds. The stockholders must pay the money on their stock. The full amount of $60,000 will be required for the construction of the road if horse power be used. Therefore, the stockholders will have to pay their subscriptions in full.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. May not the company issue notes?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; no corporation can do anything of that kind without express authority.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. There is no corporation in the country that does not do precisely what it pleases.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If people take the notes of a corporation, issued without express authority for the issue, they do so at their own risk.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Of course; but it is constantly done. It is the common practice with these companies to receive 10 per cent. cash upon their stock, and issue 90 per cent. of the amount of the capital stock in bonds.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I think my friend would not find anybody willing to take a bond from a corporation that was not authorized under its charter to issue bonds; because the company or any stockholder could go into court and plead the want of power to issue such bonds. Any man who would invest his money in bonds of that sort would not have very good business sense.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. We are not talking about the wisdom with which men may invest their money; we are discussing this bill; and the question is whether Congress, in passing it, ought not to insert a provision which will prevent this company from issuing watered stock on the one hand or bonds on the other.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is clear that a corporation can exercise no power which is not given to it by its charter.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But they do exercise such powers.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If we insert here a provision that they shall not exercise the power they may do it all the same, according to the gentleman's theory.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Then what would be the use of the prohibition?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. It would do no harm.

Mr. HEMPHILL. It would do no good.

Mr. WARNER. Allow me to make a single suggestion. Most of the corporations of this country are created under the general corporation laws of the States, which usually authorize companies to issue bonds in a certain amount. But we have no general corporation law of the United States; therefore all the powers which a corporation acquires under a charter from Congress are those embodied in the act which gives it existence.

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is no question about that. The corporation can not do anything which it is not authorized to do.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Then I understand gentlemen who have examined this bill to say that it requires the stock of this company to be paid up in cash, and the company is prohibited, either expressly or by the principles of the common law, from issuing bonds?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Oh, yes; they can not issue bonds unless we authorize them.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. But they will do it all the same.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me a moment; there is one proposition to which I wish to call his attention? While there is no provision authorizing the issuance of bonds, yet I would suggest this point: Might not the courts hold that while if bonds were issued it would be ultra vires, still, as between the persons to whom the bonds were issued and the company they would be estopped from asserting that they had no power? I call to mind a case arising in my own State, which seems to be exactly analogous. An agricultural company owned a certain amount of property which they desired to improve, and made a loan of eight or ten thousand dollars, and mortgaged the property to secure the loan.

On the maturity of the notes when the holder of the notes and the mortgage indebtedness sought to recover from the company by foreclosure, the company set up the very ground of defense raised by the chairman of this committee in regard to this railroad company under the present charter, which we are now discussing, to wit: that there was no power authorizing the creation of this mortgage, and that it was what is known in law as ultra vires. But the supreme court of the State held that inasmuch as this money had been procured and had been used for the purpose of improving and beautifying the grounds of the company by the consent of its officers and the company itself, the company would be estopped from raising that defense, and permitted the foreclosure to go on——

Mr. ROWELL. Let me interrupt my colleague a moment; are you not a little mistaken as to the foreclosure?

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. No; the mortgage was foreclosed, and a decree entered and the property sold under it.

Now, I have not in my mind exactly the precise principle involved in the case of the foreclosure of the mortgage of the university of Chicago. That was a donation originally from Senator Stephen A. Douglas. There it was claimed that they had no authority to grant a mortgage——

Mr. ROWELL. The point was that if they did such a thing the property would revert to the original owners; and the attempt was to make it revert because of the creation of a mortgage.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. My colleague will remember that the university, when the insurance company undertook to foreclose, set up the defense that the university had no authority to grant a mortgage by its charter.

That was tried in the Federal courts, and they decided that the university would be estopped from setting up such a defense, as that would be an unconscionable defense. Afterwards the Douglas heirs undertook to claim the property on the ground that the giving of the mortgage was directly in contravention of the grant, and that the fact of undertaking to make the mortgage caused a reversion of the property. I simply suggest this point, not for the purpose of making any opposition to the bill, but to call the attention of gentlemen to it to see if it may not be amended, if it be considered necessary to provide against just such contingencies.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Chairman, according to my construction of the law a corporation has no powers except those that are given to it by the legislature, either by a specific act or under the general law. It has no power to do anything except the power which the legislative branch of the Government gives it. I do not know of any amendment which would prevent a corporation from doing something that is wrong. If we put a provision in here that it shall not do wrong, and it goes and does it, we are no better off than if we did not put it in. If they do wrong, we are compelled to trust to the courts for a vindication of the law in an effort to make them do right.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. Permit me one moment further. I made the suggestion in this view: I see nothing in the charter of this company requiring that the capital stock shall be all paid up. I think it is proper under certain contingencies to allow corporations to issue bonds or mortgage its property; but this should not be done until the original subscriptions have been all paid up and the capital stock paid in. If bonds are then issued, we know that they are issued for an honest purpose. But the experience of men who have followed corporations is that where they are not required to pay up their stock in full before exercising the right to issue bonds, mortgages are made and bonds issued, with the proceeds of which they go on and complete the work, build up the road, and the stockholders get their stock substantially for nothing.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I appreciate what the gentleman says, and we do not want that done. Further, in response to the gentleman, I can only make the same answer I made to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], that is to say, we fixed the capital stock at the sum we thought the very least amount that the road could properly be built for. Of course we may have varied a little, either above or below, but the difference can not be very great either way.

Mr. ROWELL. They have to pay enough in to build the line.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. The provision of the bill, as I understand it, allows the directors to make an assessment, say of 10 per cent., which must be paid in upon whatever the amount of the capital stock may be, but the 90 per cent. is not. Now, has the gentleman any objection to inserting at the proper point, and he can better prepare the amendment than I, a provision requiring that the capital stock shall be all paid in in full before any obligations of indebtedness are issued by the company?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I would not have any objection, except that it would——

Mr. ROWELL. It would rather imply that they have the right.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes; such a provision would be tantamount to implying that they have that right.

Mr. ROWELL. I would prefer that there should not be any such implication. I think the general law is unquestionable that where there is no general power to bond a road, it can not be legally bonded; but to inferentially grant the power to bond the road would be a rather doubtful provision of law. I would rather keep it out entirely. According to the plan of the bill as arranged, they must make assessments and continue making them until they get the road in running order and provide its necessary equipments; and the purpose of not requiring all the money to be paid in at the start is that it should not be kept lying idle, but to be called in and used in building the road, until the work of construction was complete. When that is done, that is the limit of their power in making assessments.

Mr. WARNER. I want to suggest an amendment that the corporation should exercise no power not herein granted.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That is the law to-day.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas this amendment, which will cover the ground: "That the capital stock shall be paid up in full before they shall have power to operate the road."

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. That will be satisfactory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I ask unanimous consent to recur to section 1 for the purpose of offering this amendment:

Strike out the words "or double;" so that it will read: "single-track railway."

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] has an amendment which he wishes to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the first section insert:
"Provided, If an electric-motor power is used the electric wires or conductors shall be placed under the ground."

Mr. HEARD. I desire to ask the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey to the phraseology of his amendment. I apprehend his purpose is probably to prevent the use of the overhanging wires; and therefore I ask the gentleman to phrase his amendment so as to accomplish that end; and I do so for this reason: At this time, Mr. Chairman, electric motors are being used which are placed on the cars themselves in connection with a storage battery, and there are no overhanging or underlaid cables, and I know the gentleman does not desire to preclude the use of that power.

Mr. MCADOO. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri and I modify the amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment as modified, as follows:

Add to the first section the following:
"Provided, If an electric wire or cables are used the same shall be placed under ground."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 9 the following:
"Provided, That the full amount of the capital stock subscribed shall be paid in full in cash before said company shall operate said road."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARNER. I move to add to section 18 the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to which the chairman of the committee [Mr. HEMPHILL] will have no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That it shall exercise no powers not herein expressly granted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, and that the House bill corresponding to this bill be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the committee now rise and report the several bills to the House with the recommendation that they do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. HATCH] having resumed the chair, Mr. ROGERS reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration sundry bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and had directed him to report them with various recommendations.

WASHINGTON AND HIGHLAND STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6264) to incorporate the Washington and Highland Street Railway Company of the District of Columbia, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

GEORGETOWN BARGE, DOCK, ELEVATOR, AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2252) to incorporate the Georgetown Barge, Dock, Elevator, and Railway Company, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The bill (H. R. 9581) to incorporate the Georgetown Barge and Dock Company, was, by unanimous consent, laid on the table.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1051) to amend an act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railway Company of the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

BRIGHTWOOD RAILWAY COMPANY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2742) to incorporate the Brightwood Railway Company of the District of Columbia reported from the Committee of the Whole with an amendment.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

A bill (H. R. 10185) to incorporate the Brightwood Railway Company of the District of Columbia was laid on the table.

PACIFIC RAILROAD TELEGRAPH LINE.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from a committee of conference.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 1426) supplementary to the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and also of the act of July 2, 1864, and other acts amendatory of said first-named act, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

ALEX. M. DOCKERY,
C. L. ANDERSON,
S. R. PETERS,
Managers on the part of the House.
S. M. CULLOM,
O. H. PLATT,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The managers of the conference on the part of the House submitted the following statement:

The undersigned, managers on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on H. R. No. 1426, respectfully submit the following:

The effect of the Senate amendment is to relieve the railroad companies referred to in the bill from the obligation to construct telegraph lines where they are already constructed, but leaves in full force the obligation to maintain and operate telegraph lines for all the purposes expressed in the bill, and to "exercise by themselves alone all the telegraphic franchises conferred upon them and obligations assumed by them under the acts making the grants."

A. M. DOCKERY,
C. L. ANDERSON,
S. R. PETERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not suppose that there will be any disposition to discuss this bill, which passed the House on the 3d of March last by a vote of 197 yeas to 4 nays, and if there is no desire to discuss it I will demand the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered and the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, for the purpose of taking up sundry bills reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he proposes to take up the trust company bill?

Mr. HEMPHILL. That is a portion of the business that we desire to have considered.

Mr. WILKINS. Then I hope the gentleman's motion will not be agreed to.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILKINS. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 12.

Mr. WILKINS and Mr. GROSVENOR. No quorum.

Mr. WILKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] makes the point of order that no quorum has voted, and the Chair will appoint tellers. Pending that, the gentleman from Ohio moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—ayes 29, noes 55.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I would like the indulgence of the House to make a brief statement. These bills have been examined by the committee carefully, and they are very well guarded, and it seems to me that the House ought at least to give the members of the committee an opportunity to express their views upon the measures and explain them. We shall be glad to submit them to the judgment of the House after we have had a fair chance to explain their provisions.

The gentlemen who ask for these privileges are citizens of this District of the highest character. This is their only place for getting legislation; and I submit that, as the right has been reserved to Congress to legislate for this District, it is as little as we can do to allow to measures which have been reported by the House committee or passed by the Senate a fair consideration. If, when gentlemen have heard the arguments on both sides, they decide against us we shall, of course, cheerfully submit. But if we can convince members that the measures asked are proper, and that these gentlemen are entitled to the privileges they desire, they ought to be granted. The simple question is whether gentlemen will allow us to go into the Committee of the Whole that we may give our reasons for reporting these bills and submit the question of their passage to the best judgment of the House. I ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. WILKINS] to withdraw his point of "no quorum," so that we may have an opportunity for discussion on these measures.

Mr. WILKINS. If the object in going into the Committee of the Whole is only discussion, I will cheerfully assent to the gentleman's request.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Of course we expect to discuss the measures, and also to ask action upon them.

Mr. WILKINS. Well, then, we may as well settle the question right here.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If the gentleman is going to "settle" it without giving these people an opportunity to be heard, it is, of course, in his power to do so; but it seems to be a rather harsh proceeding. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HEMPHILL and Mr. WILKINS were appointed as tellers.

The question being again taken on the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 11.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of "no quorum" is insisted upon. The tellers will retain their places. Gentlemen are requested to vote on the one side or the other.

Mr. HOOKER. As it is evident that this question must come up some time or other, I can not see any reason why discussion should not be allowed to proceed. After that, gentlemen can raise any point of order when the Committee of the Whole or the House shall come to act upon the bill.

Mr. WILKINS. This is a very important measure, and it is proper it should be discussed in a full House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the count by tellers, leave of absence was, by unanimous consent, granted as follows:

To Mr. WILBER, for two weeks, on account of poor health.

To Mr. SHERMAN, until August 13, on account of business.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The tellers continuing their count, reported—ayes 74, noes 12.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, pending this division, is it in order to move that the House adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I make that motion.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio, that the House adjourn, there were—ayes 49, noes 45.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I desire to submit, as a parliamentary inquiry, whether it was in order to move to adjourn while we were voting by tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Business had intervened since the preceding motion to adjourn; and the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOMPSON] was in order.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, it is very evident we have not a quorum present. It seems to be equally evident that some of our friends here are determined we shall not have an opportunity to explain these bills to the House. Under these circumstances, hoping that we shall have a quorum on this question hereafter, and that gentlemen will be somewhat mollified by that time, I withdraw the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has divided on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask unanimous consent—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unless tellers or the yeas and nays are demanded the Chair will announce the result of the vote on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 24 voting in favor thereof.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. Before the question on ordering the yeas and nays is put, I wish to say that as the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] has been withdrawn—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded, and debate is not in order. The motion to adjourn can not be withdrawn at this time.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Ohio. I was about to ask unanimous consent to do so. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. STEELE withdrew the call for the yeas and nays.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

By Mr. RANDALL: Petition of Local Assembly No. 3516, Knights of Labor, and of Knights of Labor of Philadelphia, in favor of House bill No. 8716—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. ROCKWELL: Petition of Mrs. H. E. Norton and others, of Southfield, Mass., for repeal of internal-revenue taxes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CHARLESSTEWART: Petition of sundry citizens of Grimes and Madison Counties, Texas, for amendments to the interstate-commerce law—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. TAULBEE: Petition of John H. Long, M. D., of John W. McCullah, of Anthony Ihms, of James W. Bridges, of William McAdams, of George W. Griggs and others, and of J. S. Turner, for reference of their claims to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHITTHORNE: Petition of the estate of Mrs. J. E. Rodes, of Giles County, Tennessee, for reference of her claim to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILKINS: Resolution relative to increased compensation of Duval Robinson—to the Committee on Accounts.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 24, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Henry Hardy, of Anacostia, D. C., on behalf of the heirs of Capt. Lambert Wickes, late of the United States Navy, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 865, for their relief; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1612) to provide for holding terms of United States district and circuit courts in the State of Nebraska, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 857) to provide for the holding of the district court of the United States at Concordia, Kans.;

A bill (S. 935) to provide for holding terms of the United States district and circuit courts in the State of Nebraska; and

A bill (S. 934) to divide the State of Nebraska into two judicial districts.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am also directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred sundry petitions having reference to the bills which have just been reported, to report them adversely, and to move that the committee be discharged from their further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1733) establishing the fees and expenses of examining surgeons, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3255) granting a pension to Mary E. Cotrill, widow of Hugh B. Cotrill;

A bill (S. 3200) granting a pension to Scott S. Hawn; and

A bill (S. 3264) granting a pension to Mrs. Ellen Hand.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon; which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 3263) granting a pension to Charles Avery; and

A bill (S. 3188) granting a pension to Martha Ackerson.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of C. O. Tannehill and others, praying for the establishment of a court in the Neutral Strip on the borders of Texas, to request that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the petition lie on the table. I understand a measure reported by the Committee on Public Lands has already provided for such a court.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1648) providing for the holding of the United States courts in the city of Newark, N. J., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2041) providing for the holding of the United States courts in the city of Newark, N. J., reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1312) to providef or a term of court at Quincy, Ill., reported it without amendment.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of certain citizens of Frankfort, Ky., praying that exclusive jurisdiction be given to the Federal courts of that State over the counties nearest to each court respectively, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and moved that it lie on the table; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1477) to subdivide the western judicial district of Louisiana, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STOCKBRIDGE, from the Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1621) relating to the catching of fish by subjects of foreign governments in the waters of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3311) granting a pension to Oscar H. Kimball, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2939) granting a pension to Margaret E. Adamson;

A bill (S. 3330) for the relief of William H. Thomas;

A bill (S. 2514) granting a pension to Michael Shong;

A bill (S. 3309) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth E. Groff;

A bill (S. 3266) granting a pension to Mrs. Adelaide H. Woodall;

A bill (S. 3316) granting a pension to Jasper N. Warren; and

A bill (S. 3130) granting a pension to Patrick Welch.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 3239) granting a pension to Frederick Wunoch, late of Company H, Twentieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers;

A bill (S. 3286) granting a pension to John H. Tunney; and

A bill (S. 3276) granting restoration of pension to Sarah A. Woodbridge.

Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1116) granting a pension to Henry Frantz, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely;

He also, from the same committee, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 3369) granting an increase of pension to Henry Frantz; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1705) to provide for the erection of a public building at Statesville, N. C., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to the bill making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses. It is an amendment to that bill providing for refunding what is called the direct tax paid by the States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COURTS AT SALINA, KANS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 856) to provide for the holding of the district courts of the United States at Salina, Kans., to report it favorably, without amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. The bill which has just been reported is a local bill, and it is of some importance that it should be disposed of early. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS AT OWENSBOROUGH, KY.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3361) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Kentucky at Owensborough, in said district, and for other purposes, to report it favorably, with amendments.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at this time.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 4, line 6, after the word "himself," to strike out "similar to that referred to in the last section" and insert "with surety for the faithful discharge of his duties, and for indemnity in case of breach on which actions may be maintained in said district court;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the marshal of said district shall, by himself or deputy, attend upon the terms of the court in said division; and he may appoint a deputy to reside at Owensborough (and shall do so if ordered by the court), who shall discharge all the duties of marshal; and the marshal may require a bond of indemnity to himself, with surety for the faithful discharge of his duties, and for indemnity in case of breach on which actions may be maintained in said district court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 7, after the word "action," to strike out the words "and so forth" and insert "prosecutions and proceedings;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That this act shall not affect the jurisdiction, power, and authority of the court as to actions, prosecutions, and proceedings already begun and pending in said district, but the same will proceed as though this act had not been passed, except that the court shall have power, which it may exercise at discretion, to transfer to the court in said division such of said pending actions, prosecutions, and proceedings as might properly be begun therein under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 6, to change the word "officer" to the word "office;" so as to read:

And the deputy clerk shall provide himself with an office at Owensborough.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. VEST, Mr. HOAR, and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, were appointed.

COURTS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1612) to provide for holding terms of the United States district and circuit courts in the State of Nebraska, which was reported by me from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment this morning.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That hereafter there shall be held annually in the State of Nebraska a term of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of Nebraska at the times and places following: At Omaha in said State on the second Monday in May and second Monday in November; in Lincoln on the second Monday in January; in Hastings on the second Monday in March; and in Norfolk on the second Monday in April, and a grand and petit jury may be summoned to serve at each of said terms of court hereby established.

SEC. 2. That all writs, processes, pleas, recognizances, and bonds made or returnable to the terms of said courts as now provided by law shall be considered as taken and returnable to the terms established by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. WILSON of Iowa, Mr. EVARTS, and Mr. COKE were appointed.

COURTS AT NEWARK, N. J.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 1648) providing for the holding of the United States courts in the city of Newark, N. J., which was just reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS AT QUINCY, ILL.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider at this time the bill (H. R. 1312) to provide a term of court at Quincy, Ill., also reported by me from the Committee on the Judiciary this morning.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent to call up at this time the bill (H. R. 1477) to subdivide the western judicial district of Louisiana, which, having passed the House of Representatives, was reported favorably this morning by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] from the Committee on the Judiciary.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRINTING OF TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a resolution. It will take but a moment to read it, and I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, in pamphlet form, 5,000 copies of House bill No. 9051, entitled "An act to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue."

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine desire to interrupt morning business?

Mr. HALE. No; I do not wish to interfere with it. I thought that was through.

REPORT ON LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] on the 21st instant, with the recommendation that the blank be filled with the words "five thousand." I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That —— extra copies of Senate Report No. 1727, upon the "joint resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States in relation to the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation, and sale of alcoholic liquors," be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to fill the blank by the insertion of the words "five thousand."

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is a report from all the members of the committee who were present. There were but two of the three present to whom it could be submitted. The cost of 5,000 copies of the report will be a little under $50, I understand. The resolution was presented by the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, who called the attention of the Committee on Printing to the importance of the report and the great demand for it. Under those considerations the majority of the committee reported in favor of the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was the report made by the Committee on Education and Labor?

Mr. MANDERSON. The resolution was presented by the chairman of that committee. I do not know whether he presented it from the committee. He can answer that for himself.

Mr. BLAIR. The resolution was introduced by myself individually. I care very little whether any extra copies are printed, except that there is continual demand for them, and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which has taken a great deal of interest in the subject, as the Senator knows, would be likely in the end to make most of these copies available. I do not care to occupy time on the matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator to let the resolution lie over until to-morrow. I should like to look at it.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over until to-morrow. Shall the amendment be first agreed to?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment lie over, too.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee on the resolution will lie over until to-morrow.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 3370) granting a pension to Angelina Keefer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3371) granting a pension to Rudolph Ralle; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3372) granting a pension to Daniel B. Singer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 3373) granting a pension to Nicholas Moy; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3374) granting an increase of pension to Newton J. Shrake; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

COURTS IN DAKOTA.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10573) to provide for one additional associate justice of the supreme court of Dakota, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

JAMES F. WILSON,
WM. M. EVARTS,
G. G. VEST,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
C. B. KILGORE,
WM. WARNER,
Conferees on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House having receded, no further action is needed by the Senate.

TELEGRAPHIC FRANCHISES OF PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1426) supplementary to the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," and also of the act of July 2, 1864, and other acts amendatory of said first-named act, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

S. M. CULLOM,
O. H. PLATT,
A. P. GORMAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

A. M. DOCKERY,
C. L. ANDERSON,
S. R. PETERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report requires no action on the part of the Senate.

VETOED PENSION BILLS.

Mr. HAWLEY. I call up the resolution for printing 5,000 copies of the special report of the Committee on Pensions, which is on the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution reported by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] to print 5,000 additional copies of Senate Report No. 1667, on pension bills vetoed by the President. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Ordered, That 5,000 extra copies of Senate Report No. 1667, on certain pension bills returned to the Senate by the President without his approval, together with the views of the minority of the committee, be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution?

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there not an amendment pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are two amendments. The first amendment will be stated.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. COCKRELL's amendment, which was to add to the resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed 100,000 copies of the messages of the President of the United States sent to the Congress of the United States vetoing pension bills during the Forty-ninth Congress and the Fiftieth Congress to this date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The second amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment moved by Mr. BLAIR was to add to the amendment of Mr. COCKRELL:

Together with the reports of the Committee on Pensions of the Forty-ninth Congress thereon, and the views of the minority.

Mr. HAWLEY. The original resolution provides simply for printing 5,000 extra copies of the prescribed report of the Committee on Pensions. The Senator from Missouri moved an amendment to print 100,000 copies of all the President's veto messages. I objected to it on general grounds—that it was hardly really germane to the pending resolution, and, besides, the additional point of order under the rule, that as it would require more than $500 to do the work he proposes, it must be done by concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair passed upon that point of order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understood the Chair to pass upon that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not understand the Chair the other day to have passed upon the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the recollection of the Chair.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not so read it in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules requiring the reference of resolutions to print, where the amount is over a certain sum, to the Committee on Printing would exclude the consideration of the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not so understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have the RECORD examined.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say in connection with the resolution that when it was reported the other day from the Committee on Printing, I, in a very pleasant and I thought jocular way, suggested to the distinguished Senator in charge of it that as they were going to print so many copies of the report of the Senate Committee on Pensions, which was an attempt to reflect severely upon the President, they might add to it and print a certain veto message of the President which had come in since that report had been made, the veto message in the Dougherty case. I had no idea that I should excite my friends to the high pitch that followed, and I confess that I was very much amused. They seemed to fly into a rage over the proposition to print the veto message of the President in the Dougherty case in connection with this report.

I had no intention to offer at that time the amendment; I simply suggested it; and I thought that my friends would be glad to have the opportunity of spreading another one of those veto messages before the people of this country. The veto messages have been denounced "in season and out of season," and if they are of the character our friends say they are, they ought to publish them and send them broadcast. When I made the suggestion I found out the temper of our friends. My good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] immediately sprang up and as it were, challenged me to offer a resolution to print the President's veto messages.

Sir, I thought I understood the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, one of the able Republican leaders on the floor of the Senate, and I supposed that it was a request that I should offer a resolution to print all these veto messages and get them before the people of the country, so that their printing might not assume a partisan aspect, and I supposed if I were to offer the amendment and get these hundred thousand copies of the President's veto messages spread before the country, then the Republican party would not be charged with any partisan feeling in printing them, as the Senate is Republican.

I offered my amendment supposing, as a matter of course, that the opposite side would only be too glad to get the opportunity of printing 100,000 copies of these veto messages and scattering them broadcast throughout the length and breadth of the land. I thought I would relieve them of the responsibility of the publication, being a partisan one on their side.

To my horror and astonishment, after the kind invitation of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that I should offer this amendment, when I offered it the Senators on the other side sprang into a fearful rage over it, and then my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] was moved almost to tears over the poor Dougherty case, and the vials of his wrath were poured out upon the devoted head of the President for vetoing the pension bill in behalf of this poor widow, who had suffered such a dire calamity in being blown high into the air by an explosion at the arsenal.

I was anxious that all these veto messages should get before the country, and, as I said before, I wished we could have some means of printing from 100,000 to 500,000 copies of each veto message which has been issued by the President, and place them in the hands of every man, woman, and child in this broad land. I am willing to do that, but, I supposed our Republican friends wanted the privilege of doing it, and I offered it to them. But now how is it? The distinguished leader from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], who was not chosen to lead his party, appealed to me to withdraw this amendment, and finally the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] made a point of order that it was not in order.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that there is nothing in the way of the Senator offering it as an independent resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it goes to the Committee on Printing, and there it will sleep the sleep that knows no waking.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will guaranty that it will be reported before night.

Mr. COCKRELL. It will be reported adversely then. I want to get the veto messages printed with this expression of the Committee on Pensions, the majority report. I want them to go side by side. They will be two excellent documents and they will read well. The people would like to read the Dougherty veto message just after reading the report of the Committee on Pensions, and I should like to give them the opportunity of doing it.

Mr. President, I can not see why our friends do not want that message printed. I can not see why they do not want all the veto messages printed. We printed all of them up to the close of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, and there is great demand for that volume; the people like to read it. But the veto messages of the last session of the Forty-ninth Congress and the veto messages of the present session have not been printed. I would like to have a publication of a compilation of all the veto messages of the present Executive of the United States, and I would like the people to read them all, and I hope our friends will offer the resolution, and if the Presiding Officer declares it out of order and prevents the publication of it in connection with this report, then I shall offer it as a separate resolution and have it referred to the committee; or the resolution itself can be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the admiration which the Senator from Missouri entertains for the veto message in the Dougherty case compels me to submit some observations to the Senate at this time upon that matter, which may possibly increase the respect in which he holds that extraordinary document.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator just permit me to say one word in regard to that?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I only referred to that because of what was said. Now, I shall have somewhat to say on that veto message when it is under discussion. I did not undertake to discuss the message and the facts in the case this morning, because I supposed the Committee on Pensions would report it back to the Senate, as it has been referred to that committee. I say now in advance that I shall be exceedingly gratified to have the Committee on Pensions report it back to the Senate and give us a chance to discuss it, and that might save the Senator from Minnesota from entering into a discussion of it now, because I am anxious that that case particularly shall be discussed. I think I can throw some light upon that subject-matter.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Missouri having brought the Dougherty case into this discussion on a motion to print 100,000 copies of the veto messages, it is my purpose to gratify him now to some extent upon that topic.

The Dougherty case came before the last Congress on a petition which was signed, among other persons, by Admiral Porter and by the venerable George Bancroft, attesting their acquaintance with this woman, their knowledge of the peculiar calamities under which she had labored for so many years, which in their judgment made it proper that Congress should intervene in her behalf by a measure of special relief. That petition and those facts were examined by the committee of the Forty-ninth Congress and a favorable report was made. It received no legislative action, and again came before the present Pension Committee of the Senate, received a careful examination and a favorable conclusion upon substantially the following facts:

Mrs. Dougherty, now a woman between fifty and sixty years of age, was during the war employed in the Government arsenal in this city in filling cartridges, an employment of peculiar danger; and while there, without any fault on her part, an explosion took place which killed several, broke her collar-bone, scarred her face, from which she inhaled the flames, was made sick, and for a certain time insane. It was and is one of those cases falling within narrow exceptions, such as teamsters, quartermaster's clerks, and other civil employés in the Government military service; falling, I say, within narrow exceptions where here and there Congress has from time to time put persons in her position upon the pension-rolls.

Her husband at this time was a soldier in the Army. His name was Daniel Dougherty, He came home from the war, and finding this woman in this pitiable condition, after remaining around Washington for a time sick, apparently so sick that the last ministrations of his religion were thought to have been required for him, although they were not administered, left his family ostensibly to go West in search of his health, and in the course of a few days came a letter or telegram to her announcing his death. About the same time their only son, the stay of this woman if he had lived, being then an employé in the navy-yard in this city, was killed by an accident there. Daniel Dougherty, who thus disappeared from this woman's side, has never reappeared to her personally.

She filed an application for a pension as his widow. The proof of death was that of a comrade who attested to his death in Paducah, Ky.; of an attending physician, who certified to it not of his own personal knowledge, but as exceedingly probable, and the proof in that respect was so cogent that the Pension Office in 1878 passed this woman's claim and put her on the pension-roll as the widow of Daniel Dougherty.

She enjoyed that pension three months. It began to be noised about from some source or other that Daniel Dougherty was not dead, that the report of his death, which had been conveyed to this woman, was a fabrication, and the office very properly undertook to ascertain whether the man yet lived, and it found that he did, whereupon the pension of Mary Ann Dougherty was suspended. Daniel Dougherty afterwards filed his claim for a pension on account of injuries, as he said, received in the service.

The Pension Committee did not proceed as the President of the United States would seem to indicate by his message, upon any theory or any mistake that Mary Ann Dougherty was the widow of Daniel Dougherty. The committee knew that Daniel Dougherty yet lived; they knew that he had been denied a pension, although he had made application, for injuries received in the service, but they placed the equities of Mrs. Dougherty upon the facts which I have stated—facts which commended themselves to the sympathies and judgment of the committee; facts which in scores of instances on behalf of men, and, I think, in some cases on behalf of women, have resulted in legislation by Congress in their favor.

This man Dougherty has never appeared to his family again. This woman for twenty years has lived in this city worse than in a state of widowhood, on account of the action of this man. She lost her son in a quasi military service. She herself received grievous injuries in the same capacity, namely, employment in an arsenal.

The President of the United States has seen fit to read to Congress and through Congress to exhibit to the country a homily upon its alleged carelessness and remissness in the way of duty in respect to this particular case, and also a general homily and reproof of Congress. He states in his message as a statement of fact, he informs the country in his message as follows:

> Her husband, Daniel Dougherty, is now living in Philadelphia, and is a pensioner in his own right for disability alleged to have been incurred while serving in the Thirty-fourth New Jersey Volunteers. Of this fact this beneficiary has been repeatedly informed.

Here we have the President of the United States stating in a paper which should be marked by truth in every word it contains, as a reason for refusing a pension to this woman, that Daniel Dougherty is now living in Philadelphia and is now a pensioner in his own right. "False as a bulletin" used to be a proverb in other countries. The phrase is particularly applicable to this paper, for there is not one word of truth in the allegation of the message which I have just read. The truth is directly the contrary; and my assertion in that respect does not depend on any outside investigation, but it depends on the face of the very record which the President of the United States in theory had before him when he fulminated this extraordinary document.

Daniel Dougherty never enjoyed a pension in his own right or in any other; and further than that, I say that the record shows that the claim of Daniel Dougherty for a pension was disallowed by the Pension Office. Here is the proof——

Mr. COCKRELL. That did not cause him to be considered dead and his widow entitled to a pension because he was disallowed a pension.

Mr. DAVIS. I say the President of the United States, in a message to the Senate, as a reason why he could not approve the claim of Mary Ann Dougherty, stated that Daniel Dougherty is now in the enjoyment of a pension, and I say the President was misled in that respect by the source to which he applies for information to supply the material for his veto messages. Here is the proof:

> DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF PENSIONS,
>
> SIR: In compliance with your request I have the honor to transmit herewith the papers in invalid claim No. 392598, of Daniel Dougherty, formerly of Company C, Thirty-fourth New Jersey Volunteers, which was rejected in December, 1886, because there was no record at the War Department of the injury to his back, and he was unable to prove its incurrence in the service and line of duty.
> Very respectfully,
> WM. E. McLEAN,
> Acting Commissioner.
> Hon. CUSHMAN K. DAVIS,
> Chairman Committee on Pensions, the Senate.

How does that consist, this official announcement from the Pension Bureau, with the averment of the President of the United States in the message designed to go forth to the country, which the Senator from Missouri is so anxious to have printed to the extent of 100,000 copies—I ask how does that statement consist with his affirmation on the second page of this message that Daniel Dougherty is a pensioner in his own right for disability incurred in the service? And when the President of the United States undertakes to lecture Congress and its committees for carelessness and want of vigilance in examining records, which Heaven knows are painful and laborious enough to examine, I would advise the particular Tite Barnacle in the veto division of the great American Circumlocution Office who furnishes the President with information in cases of this character to be more circumspect in his investigations.

This is not all. Here is the original record of the Pension Office in the Daniel Dougherty case. If oyer is claimed, profert is made, and upon the back of its envelope stands an indorsement which ought to have been the first thing seen by that familiar of the Pension Office who supplies the President of the United States the materials for the vetoes, who advised and instructed the President of the United States that Daniel Dougherty is now a pensioner in his own right.

On the 12th of June, 1888, about three weeks before the President transmitted his veto, this inscription was made on the wrapper in Daniel Dougherty's case, June 12, 1888.

Howard—

That is the name of Dougherty's attorney—

Testimony recently filed warrants no change of action.

Three weeks before the President affirmed that Daniel Dougherty was in the enjoyment of a pension, the Pension Office noted an inscription on the envelope of official action that there was no warrant for Daniel Dougherty's application for a change of the rejection which had been made in 1886.

Other charges are made in this veto message.

The police records of the precinct in which she has lived for years show that she is a woman of very bad character.

I took occasion the other day to express my opinion of the disposition which could dictate any person grabbling among the police records of this city to break down the claim of this woman for a pension, certified to as she was by the people who signed her petition.

Now let us see how much warrant there is in that charge. There is no question that this woman up to the year 1872, driven insane by physical suffering and mental calamity, had been arrested, I think not more than five times, for offenses exceedingly venial in their character, and to which if she ever committed them at all (for there is no record of her conviction), she was impelled by her misfortunes and her mental aberration. But it was not enough for the inquisitors of the Pension Office, who have been the purveyors to the President of the United States of materials for vetoes, to include only the cases in which this woman indisputably figured.

They went back and included women by the name of Dougherty who do not bear her first name, whose ages, vocations, and station in life manifestly show that they are different persons.

On the 12th of April, 1864, "Mary Dougherty, thirty-five years old," was arrested for "intoxication," "married." On October 31, 1864, "Mary Dougherty, married," again arrested. In 1864, December 5, "Mary A. Dougherty, white, age thirty-five, Irish," and then a charge against her which could come from nothing but the brutality of a policeman and the further charge of "selling liquor without a license," a thing in which nobody ever thought that she was engaged in. This particular Mary Dougherty is then thirty years old, the other two are thirty-five years old. September 13, 1866, "Mary A. Dougherty, white, age thirty-six"—she has got back to thirty-six now—"Irish;" now she is a "single woman" instead of being a married woman, and engaged in a vocation which I will not stigmatize any woman by naming. June 7, 1868, "Mary A. Dougherty, age twenty-seven, white, Irish, servant"—this woman that was thirty-five in 1864, has reverted in 1868 to twenty-seven years of age. On the 15th of April, "Mary A. Dougherty, aged forty-one, white, servant, single"—this married woman has become single. In 1874, September 8, "Annie Dougherty," another woman apparently, age thirty-three, a "single" woman; and on February 18, 1879, "Annie Dougherty, age thirty-five, intoxicated."

No man of sense would ever, upon a memorandum of that character, which is a lead-pencil slip in the records of the Pension Office in the Mary Ann Dougherty case, have a right to infer that the various Annie Doughertys and Mary Doughertys were the same as Mary Ann Dougherty when Mary Ann is a married woman, always so known, and the others are single.

I have troubled the Senate with these remarks——

Mr. COCKRELL. Did I understand the Senator to say that Mary Ann Dougherty has always been considered married when she applied for a pension as a widow?

Mr. DAVIS. Mary Ann Dougherty, when she applied for a pension, considered, and the Pension Office did, that her husband was dead, and he had been dead to her over fifteen years.

Mr. COCKRELL. She was a single woman then, was she not?

Mr. DAVIS. She was supposed to be single then.

Mr. COCKRELL. She had reported herself single then, had she not?

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose she would have been put down a widow, very likely.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would depend upon circumstances. She was not then married, or she would not have been a widow.

Mr. DAVIS. These small matters do not touch the merits of this controversy. I am adducing them to show the extraordinary pains to which the emissaries of the Pension Office went to enable the President to frame a veto message out of which political capital can be made; and my endeavor is, as the Senator from Missouri is pressing the publication of that remarkable document, to be heard a little through the country as to the extraordinary misstatements of facts by which the President of the United States has been imposed upon by those little creatures in the Pension Office who act at his dictation in order to vindicate the feeble infallibility of their vocation.

I do not know that I have anything further to say on this subject. There is no question from the character of the people who have signed her petition, the Hon. George Bancroft, in whose family I am informed she lived as a servant. Admiral Porter who knows concerning her—there is no question that for years past this woman has led a reputable life; and the offenses charged, even if they were committed, were always venial in the extreme, probably induced by her misfortunes. Some of the most noble and sainted women in this city have called upon me personally to assure me of this woman's character in this respect. But suppose it is all so, what have these things to do with her equitable claim upon the United States for its charity? She forfeits nothing by any such lapses which she may have committed.

If we at times will pension men, quartermaster's clerks, teamsters, women the widows of wheelwrights who have lost their lives, or become injured, or have been taken prisoners of war while performing civil duties incident to military service, what is the reason that this poor old Irish woman, who herself suffered in body and in mind, who was deprived of her child while serving the Government in a quasi-military capacity, who was left neither maid, wife, nor widow, by the desertion of a heartless husband—what is the reason that the President of the United States shall make this extraordinary raid upon the character of this poor old Irish woman?

That is all I have to say about the Dougherty case, and I have spoken in the hope that my words may possibly commend this veto message to the further and increased idolatry of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does most emphatically increase my admiration, and I am exceedingly gratified that the Senator has taken the opportunity to make the statement that he has. Now, will the Senator do me the kindness to say what evidence the Committee on Pensions has that there was any explosion at the arsenal in the city of Washington on the 28th day of June, 1864, and that the claimant, Mary Ann Dougherty, was an employé there and injured in that arsenal explosion?

Mr. DAVIS. Nothing would give me greater pleasure:

To all whom it may concern—

This is from the records of the Pension Bureau, and acted on by that institution—

To all whom it may concern:

We, the undersigned, certify that Mary A. Dougherty was employed at this arsenal, and that while at her work on the 2d day of July, 1864, was severely burned by an explosion of powder. At said explosion several were killed.

JOHN MURPHY.
T. WHYTE.
R. B. CLARK.
JOSEPH CAMPBELL,
Acting Sergeant Ordnance Department.
JAMES HARTWELL,
Sergeant of Ordnance.
GEORGE W. McKEE,
Captain and Brevet Major, Commanding.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the date of that?

Mr. DAVIS. It is not dated. It is from the Pension Office files connected with Mrs. Dougherty's claim; a copy.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the evidence on which the Pension Committee acted?

Mr. DAVIS. The evidence on which the Commissioner of Pensions acted in deciding on her claim.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that the Commissioner of Pensions pensioned her upon the ground of the injury that she received in the arsenal?

Mr. DAVIS. I presume that it went very far towards affecting his determination.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not so understood it; and I would thank the Senator to say whether the pension granted by the Pension Office was to her as the widow of a soldier or was for injuries received in the arsenal explosion?

Mr. DAVIS. Of course, everybody knows she was at that time pensioned on the supposition, honestly entertained by her and everybody else, that she was Daniel Dougherty's widow, and this came in as incidental.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all right. Then the Pension Office granted her a pension on the ground that she was the widow of a deceased soldier. That theory has been exploded, and the Committee on Pensions recommend the granting of a pension to her because she was injured in this explosion. Is not that the reason?

Mr. DAVIS. I will answer the Senator when he is through.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would like to know the ground on which the Committee on Pensions recommended this pension. If they recommended it upon the ground that she is a widow, the Senator from Minnesota has established the fact that the husband is living. If they granted it upon the ground that she was engaged in a quasi military employment, and in that employment got an injury, that is a different question, and I want to know about it.

Mr. DAVIS. That is the ground on which the committee proceeded.

Mr. COCKRELL. Exactly so. Then we know where we stand. The Senator has criticised the President of the United States for relying upon statements made from the Pension Office in regard to the pension having been granted to Dougherty and also in regard to the charges made through the police office against this widow. I have not had any time to investigate the statements in regard to Dougherty being alive or whether this is the same Dougherty or not. I take it for granted it is.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not dispute that, but I have not investigated and looked into that question at all.

But suppose the President was misled by reports from the Pension Office, reports made by Republican clerks who fill four-fifths of the positions in that office. He may have been misled; I will not deny it; I do not know. But that is not the question. This issue has been narrowed down to the question that the Committee on Pensions granted this woman a pension because she was in quasi military employment and was injured, and all the evidence they have of that fact is a certificate not verified by affidavit and not dated.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Minnesota that I dare him to make a report back to the Senate recommending the passage of that bill over the President's veto because Mary Ann Dougherty was an employé in the Government service and injured—I just dare him to do it. We will stand on that issue before the country. They have a chance of vindicating the correctness of their judgment. The chairman of the Pension Committee comes before the people of the United States and boldly tells them that the committee have granted a pension to a woman because three or four individuals gave a certificate without date and without affidavit that on a certain day she was working in an arsenal and was injured. Is that the way the Committee on Pensions act? Is that the kind of evidence they pass bills upon? Think of it!

Mr. HAWLEY. May I make one suggestion there?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. One of the signers of that certificate is a well-known officer of the Army of the very highest character, Major McKee, who was in command there at the time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not care what his character is. I say Mary Ann Dougherty was not employed there. I say Mary Ann Dougherty was never injured in any explosion there. I say I can show the official record of the fact, and I dare the committee to come in and stand on that alleged fact.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator is getting excited.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not a bit. I want to stir up that committee to make that report. I dare them to do it.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly; I always yield with pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether he pretends to say there is any record in the Pension Bureau contradicting the statement of Major McKee that she was so employed and so injured?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not know what is in the Pension Bureau, but I say that if a committee of the Senate will report a bill to the Senate upon a simple certificate, not dated and not verified by affidavit, not an official certificate——

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Missouri has been a military character, and I would like to ask him whether it is not the rule of military law that the certificate of the commanding officer in charge is always valid without the addition of an affidavit?

Mr. COCKRELL. The certificate of a commanding officer made at the time and in the line of duty. If it had been the duty of this officer to have made any certificate at the time of this explosion that would be competent evidence; but the certificate is made many years after the occurrence. It is not an official certificate; it is not made in the line of duty; it was not made at the time the occurrence took place.

Mr. President, this is a very easy matter to settle. We have got it all drawn out to one concentrated point. Mary Ann Dougherty, say the Committee on Pensions, was an employé in an arsenal of the United States, and receiving pay from the United States Government, and whilst she was in that employment an explosion occurred and she was injured, and she should now be allowed a pension because of that injury. If she were in the employ of the Government, there is a record; her name was upon the list of employés of that arsenal. She was receiving a salary from the United States Government. Nobody works for the Government without a salary. She received pay from the United States and when she was paid for her services she gave a receipt, and all those matters are of record. Now we do get down to the point; there it is.

I challenge the Senator to produce a roll of the employés of that arsenal showing the name of Mary Ann Dougherty. I challenge the Senator to produce a solitary line to show that Mary Ann Dougherty was ever paid one nickel, one penny for any services rendered by her in 1864. Now we have it. There is the question. I say the Committee on Pensions acted without any evidence, and I assert that Mary Ann Dougherty was not employed in the arsenal; I say that she was not injured in the explosion; and I say that part of the scheme is infamous, false, and fraudulent. It has all been concocted to work upon the sympathies of the distinguished Senators upon the committee, and that is all there is of it.

I have made a square issue. Let the Senator come in with this case and report to pass the bill over the President's veto, on the ground that Mary Ann Dougherty was in the employ of the United States in the arsenal in June or July, 1864, and there was blown up—away up until she could see the stars according to her report; blown up and injured, made insensible, so that she has never recovered from it, and for that reason they propose to pension her and override the President's veto. That is the issue. I dare them to bring it in. I will meet you on that issue squarely and fairly. We shall have some evidence then. The committee can not then hide behind a mere certificate without date and not verified by affidavit.

How cheap these things are! How cheap it is to go around and get a general indorsement. Merely to sign a name does not cost anything. Anybody can sign a name to a mere recommendation. Now we have got this case down to that point. I have made my assertions, I have challenged the committee to bring in their report recommending the passage of this bill over the President's veto, and there I will rest that case.

The President of the United States was perfectly justified in making some of the criticisms made in his message. When we come to discuss the vetoed bills, or this report in favor of passing those bills over the President's veto, we shall see who has committed the most blunders, the President of the United States or the Pension Committee. We will take the reports, we will take the action, and we will see who is the painstaking, careful investigator, the Pension Committee or the President of the United States. I am willing to stand upon that record. I say that the President has been actuated by the highest and noblest motives in vetoing many of these pension bills. I say that he has acted wisely and justly, and I say that many of them should not have been passed.

I find in the report made on this Mary Ann Dougherty bill in the House of Representatives that the petition of the applicant is set out in full. The report begins with these words:

> The facts in the case are substantially set forth in Mrs. Dougherty's petition, which is as follows.

Then follows the petition, and that petition has this at the end:

> The undersigned respectfully represent that they are acquainted with Mary Ann Dougherty, believe the facts stated in the aforesaid petition to be true, and join her therein and ask consideration of same from your honorable body.
> DAVID D. PORTER, Admiral.
> MRS. GEORGE U. MORRIS.
> S. NICHOLSON,
> Commodore United States Navy.
> W. A. LEONARD,
> Rector of St. John's Parish.
> E. C. WEAVER,
> Late Captain United States Vols.
> GEORGE W. ROUZER,
> Correspondent Army and Navy Journal.
> GEO. BANCROFT.

The Senator from Minnesota has referred to the distinguished historian, philanthropist, patriot, and statesman, George Bancroft. I want to know if the George Bancroft whose signature is attached to this petition is the George Bancroft, historian, statesman, patriot, etc. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if the George Bancroft whose name is printed to this petition is the George Bancroft the historian, statesman, etc.

Mr. DAVIS. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. You believe it is. Well, we shall see about that. I say I doubt it. I wish the Senator from Minnesota when he reports this bill back to the Senate, recommending its passage over the President's veto, to make a point of the fact that George Bancroft, the historian, statesman, patriot, etc., indorsed this, and that his genuine signature is there.

Now, another point. Mrs. Dougherty says:

> I obtained employment in the United States arsenal making cartridges for the United States Army then in the field; that on or about the 28th day of June, 1864, while so employed and in the line of duty, as above stated, an explosion occurred, which killed and injured a number of the employés.
> Your petitioner was one of the victims. I was severely burned and internally injured, besides being mentally injured by the fall from the height to which I was thrown through the force of the explosion.

Thrown away up in the air.

> My flesh was burned, as scars will show, and I inhaled the fire. My collar bone was also broken. I was unconscious when found, and became insane from the injuries received.

That is a horrible picture. I say an explosion did occur, but not on that day. It occurred in the arsenal, where there were a large number of employés at that time. Their names were upon the roll; twenty-one were killed and thirty or forty badly injured. The Congress of the United States appropriated $2,000 in money to assist the injured. There was a roll of every one killed and wounded there; all their names were upon the roll. The roll and the list show that $2,000 was gratuitously distributed, and every one that got a dollar of that money signed the roll? Produce it, will you? Show Mary Ann Dougherty's name on it. She was not employed in the arsenal; she was not blown up in the explosion; and the whole thing is a concoction and a delusion and a fraud. Again she says:

> My son (the eldest), a bright boy, was killed by machinery in the United States navy-yard at Washington.

I will thank the committee when they report this bill back to show some evidence of that fact that is brought in here to excite the feelings, the generosity, and magnanimity of that committee, to bring some evidence that Mary Ann Dougherty ever had a son killed by the machinery in the navy-yard. I do not believe a word of it. I do not think you can show a particle of evidence of it and I challenge you to do it.

The Senators may throw their fulminations at the President of the United States for these veto messages. He is doing his duty honestly, conscientiously, faithfully, and patriotically, and their answer only makes me remember the old adage that "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." Continue your fulminations to your hearts' content against the President and his position, and your arrows will fall harmless at his feet.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——
